Maria Eagle: I thank the Minister for that reply, which seems to confirm how much worse clear-up rates became under the previous Conservative Administration. What reassurance can he give to the residents of Dymchurch estate in Speke who suffer from the behaviour of young children and youths wandering the streets with hammers and pickaxes, causing nuisance, vandalism, who are gradually demolishing that estate? What reassurance can my hon. Friend give my constituents that things will improve under this Administration?

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend is right to say that things got progressively worse under the previous Administration. That deterioration was brought to light in a paper published by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary before the election. What we offer to overcome those problems is the contents of the Crime and Disorder Bill—the way in which we intend to speed up youth justice; action to nip things in the bud with young offenders; the move from repeat cautioning to the final warning system; and the introduction of sentences that will work as a deterrent.

In addition, the partnership approach will involve the police and local authorities in identifying problems such as those on estates such as Dymchurch. We will make sure that they take action to prevent problems from developing and to cut the existing crime rate.

Sir Sydney Chapman: Of more relevance, would the Minister confirm that the number of offences cleared up last year rose by 1 per cent. compared with the clear-up rate in 1995? Without any sense of complacency, would he not say that that represents a significant improvement given that the number of recorded crimes has dropped by 10 per cent. in the past four years?

Mr. Michael: Of course, that increase was from a low base and after a massive deterioration, as illustrated by the figures that I gave earlier. The hon. Gentleman is being extremely complacent about the performance of his Government.

Dr. Iddon: Last Saturday night in my constituency, a young taxi driver, Quadir Hussain, aged 32, was involved in an incident with four passengers in his cab. As a result, he was so frightened that he fled and was pursued by one of those passengers across the extremely busy dual carriageway, the A666, where he was hit by an oncoming car and killed. This afternoon the drivers of private hire cars in Bolton are meeting to discuss the ever-rising number of incidents involving them. Will my hon. Friend please note that incident, and join the rest of the House in sending Mrs. Hussain and the rest of the Hussain family our sincerest condolences?

Mr. Michael: I certainly join my hon. Friend in expressing condolence. Any such event is absolutely horrific. We need to learn lessons from any such occasion, which can be done only when we know the full facts of the actual incident. My hon. Friend is right to remind us that individual events are not just statistics but involve human beings whose lives are often ruined as a result, as are the lives of their loved ones.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: One statistic of the past 10 years that will cause concern to both sides of the House is the reduction of 24 per cent. in the conviction rate for rape, while the number of rapes recorded has increased threefold. The Home Secretary has said that he will legislate to stop intimidatory cross-examination of rape victims by those who are accused of raping them. In the past few days, however, the Lord Chancellor has warned of the serious difficulty in doing that, because of the incorporation of the European convention on human rights into British law. As in other subjects, which Cabinet Minister should we believe?

Mr. Michael: If there are problems with the ECHR, they would exist whether or not it was incorporated into our law, because we are signed up to that convention. The point is that there are serious difficulties in relation to the number of successful prosecutions for rape and increasing people's confidence in the system. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has established a working party of officials, which will report early in the new year on a range of matters, including ways to enable people to be certain that they will be protected and can give their evidence in a proper manner. We hope that that will make a great impact on the confidence felt by victims about how the system operates.

Metropolitan Police (Corruption)

5. Mr. Gordon Prentice: What steps he is taking to eliminate corruption in the Metropolitan police. [20160]

Mr. Straw: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis is determined to root out corruption in the Metropolitan police. He has my full support in doing so. He has set out his strategy for tackling corruption in the "London Beat", his five-year strategic plan. He informs me that, as for all criminal offences, he is using proactive methods and intelligence to target suspects. I await with interest the report and recommendations of the Home Affairs Select Committee in respect of the police complaints and discipline system more generally.

Mr. Prentice: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply, which many people will find reassuring, especially after the astonishing news at the weekend that the police threw road blocks around the headquarters of the flying squad at Walthamstow. Will my right hon. Friend tell me again whether the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolitan will have all the resources necessary to root out corruption? More importantly, will he answer this simple question: why is corruption allowed to take root in the Metropolitan police? Why was there not a system in place to prevent that sort of thing happening?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks. He asks whether the Commissioner will ensure that all the resources necessary are available to the Metropolitan Police Complaints Investigation Bureau; that is the case, and the number of officers assigned to that bureau has recently been increased. I do not accept the implication of my hon. Friend's specific final question, that corruption is widespread in the Metropolitan police. The extent to which it occurs is a matter of profound concern; there should be no corruption in any police force. But no police officer should be in any doubt about the resolve of both the Commissioner and myself to ensure that any corruption is rooted out vigorously and firmly.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: Preliminarily, does the Home Secretary accept that my colleagues and I wish him and his colleagues, you, Madam Speaker, and all hon. Members a happy Christmas? Will the right hon. Gentleman accept that I share his strong view on the unacceptability of corruption in the Metropolitan police or any other police force? Does the Home Secretary believe that the dismissing of officers from that force is a sufficient response to prima facie corrupt behaviour? Will he ensure that the Commissioner has all the legal powers he needs to deal ruthlessly with corrupt behaviour?

Mr. Straw: I return the right hon. Gentleman's slightly ambiguous compliment in a wholly unambiguous way. Labour Members wish the right hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends a happy Christmas and a good new year, particularly in their Front-Bench positions—long may their positions continue.

The right hon. Gentleman also asked whether I believed that the power to dismiss police officers was sufficient. It is necessary in respect of corrupt police officers; it may not be sufficient. I note fully what he says about the need for the Commissioner and other chief constables to have the full range of legal powers available to them. The implication of the right hon. Gentleman's question was that he believed that the current powers were not particularly satisfactory. I await with great interest the report of the Home Affairs Select Committee on complaints and discipline in the police, on the basis of which I shall make recommendations to the House and the other place.

Mr. Mullin: Does my right hon. Friend recall that, as long ago as 1993, his predecessor had plans for a radical shake-up of disciplinary procedures in the police, which would have greatly assisted the Commissioner in dealing with the most recent allegations of corruption, but that for some reason that shake-up did not occur? Can he think of any reason why the shake-up was not proceeded with? Will he assure the House that he will not give way to any of the mighty vested interests that might be pressing him to do little or nothing about the problems?

Mr. Straw: I know the reason that the shake-up was not proceeded with. The proposals were made in a speech to the Police Superintendents Association in 1993 by my predecessor but one, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). They were abandoned when my immediate predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), became Home Secretary. As I said to the right hon. Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney), we await the report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, which my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) chairs with such distinction. I repeat our determination, which is shared by all hon. Members on both sides of the House, to ensure that the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and other chief constables have the full range of powers effectively and ruthlessly to root out corruption inside the police service.

Repeat Offenders

6. Mr. Loughton: What plans he has to make special sentencing powers available to courts for repeat offenders. [20162]

The Minister of State, Home Office (Ms Joyce Quin): We have already implemented the provisions in the Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 under which offenders convicted for the second time of a serious violent or sexual offence will receive an automatic life sentence; and those convicted for a third time of dealing in hard drugs will receive a mandatory minimum sentence of seven years imprisonment.

The Government's Crime and Disorder Bill, which is currently before Parliament, provides for a statutory duty on the Court of Appeal to consider providing sentencing guidelines for all the main offences, which would ensure greater consistency in sentencing.

Mr. Loughton: I am grateful for that answer, but, having accepted the principle of extending prison stays for serious sexual and violent offenders as laid down by the previous Home Secretary, what do the Government have against the principle of minimum sentences for repeat or career burglars? Is taking tough action against that serious area of crime not a priority for the Government in the lifetime of this Parliament?

Ms Quin: As I made clear at the last Home Department questions, we are not against that principle. This would appear to be a severe case of repeat questioning—[Interruption.] That question has already been answered effectively by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and other colleagues on several occasions. There is no difference between our view and that of the previous Government in this respect; but it was clear in the measures adopted by the previous Government that they had neither the resources nor an immediate timetable for implementing the measures to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Angela Smith: A recent incident in my constituency involving a sex offender has brought home strongly the importance of ensuring public confidence in the sentencing of sex offenders. What plans does my hon. Friend have to ensure that, following release, serious sex offenders and violent offenders are properly supervised?

Ms Quin: I am glad to be able to tell my hon. Friend that the Crime and Disorder Bill will contain provisions for extending supervision of sexual and violent offenders, which will respond to the point she has raised.

Drug Rehabilitation Establishments

7. Mr. Ben Chapman: If he will list the drug rehabilitation establishments which the Under Secretary with responsibility has visited since 1 May. [20163]

Mr. George Howarth: I have made visits to look at drug prevention programmes, rehabilitation programmes and various forms of treatment, both in the community and within the criminal justice system. In that context, I have visited Prison Service establishments with drug treatment programmes at Lindholme, Moorland, Lancaster, Channings Wood, Wetherby and Liverpool; probation initiatives in Plymouth, Bristol and Merseyside; several drug prevention initiative supported projects in Derby, West Yorkshire, Tower Hamlets and East Sussex; a voluntary initiative run by Cranstoun Drug Services in Wimbledon; and an arrest referral scheme in Oxford. As a result, I believe that there are many useful ways of reducing the demand for drugs and, at the same time, using the criminal justice system creatively to break the link between crime and drugs.

Mr. Chapman: I thank my hon. Friend the Minister for that response. Does he agree that there is a clear correlation between drug misuse and crime and that one way of tackling that is through the treatment of offenders? Does he also agree that the provisions in the Crime and Disorder Bill and the appointment of an anti-drugs co-ordinator show how serious is the intent of the Government to tackle the issue?

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend is right, in that there is a growing body of evidence of a strong link between drugs and crime. On Friday last week, I was talking to a couple of people who were receiving treatment while on bail as part of probation arrangements that offer an opportunity to deal with such people. We have made a start by appointing the UK Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator, Keith Hellawell, and his deputy Mike Trace; and there are provisions, particularly for treatment and testing orders, in the Crime and Disorder Bill. We are determined to use every possible opportunity within the criminal justice system to tackle the growing problem in a creative and helpful way.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister send his condolences to the families of those who have lost loved ones in 1997, because of the menace of drugs? Will he send his thanks to those who painstakingly work with drug addicts to rehabilitate them? Finally, will he condemn The Independent on Sunday for its irresponsible campaign to decriminalise cannabis in this country? It is a gateway drug, whose use might lead to people moving on to far harder drugs—although the message should be communicated that cannabis itself is a serious drug and extremely damaging to those who take it.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman is right. Obviously, I would join him in sending condolences to all the families that have lost relatives as a result of drug misuse—and I would also send condolences to the families that have been wrecked by the things that occur when people become involved in drugs. Of course, we join the hon. Gentleman in sending our best wishes to those who do the difficult job of working with drug misusers, voluntarily or through the criminal justice system.

The obsession of The Independent on Sunday with the subject of decriminalising cannabis is irresponsible. I am sad to say that it reflects a concern on the part of the chattering classes, which is often an apology for their own use rather than their having anything constructive to say about current drugs policy.

Corruption

8. Mr. Wyatt: If he will make a statement on the Government's plans to create a new, single offence of corruption. [20164]

Mr. Straw: On 9 June, I published a consultative paper on the reform of the law on corruption. A copy is available in the Library.

I shall carefully consider the responses to that paper, to the Law Commission paper on corruption offences and any further recommendations that the Committee on Standards in Public Life may make in relation to the criminal law. I expect to make a further statement on the reform of the law in this area early next year.

Mr. Wyatt: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. When he is considering future changes, will he contemplate holding those data centrally, to facilitate changes in the forthcoming information Act?

Mr. Straw: I see no reason why much of the available information on corruption should not be held centrally. Sometimes information cannot be held centrally because of disproportionate cost, but we shall do our best to comply with my hon. Friend's request.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does the Home Secretary agree that the offence of corruption of a Member of Parliament is serious, so the Prevention of Corruption Acts 1906 and 1916 should be amended to include the offence of attempted corruption of a Member of Parliament or any elected representative?

Mr. Straw: There are very strong grounds for proceeding as the hon. Gentleman proposes. I am currently considering responses to the consultative paper that I published earlier in the year; when I have done so, I shall make proposals to the House, and it will be a matter for the House to decide.

Mr. Dismore: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that his proposals for a new offence will take into account the type of corruption that was exposed in the High Court on Friday, when Dame Shirley Porter and others were found guilty of wilful misconduct, which cost £27 million? Will he also join me and the other Labour former Westminster councillors in the House in condemning the Conservative party, which has not said a word against Dame Shirley Porter, although one of those found guilty continues to serve as a Westminster councillor?

Does my right hon. Friend agree with me and the Evening Standard editorial on Friday that Dame Shirley Porter should be stripped of her dameship? In view of the finding of the High Court that Dame Shirley Porter lied to the court, will he refer the matter to the Metropolitan police for investigation as to whether she committed perjury?

Mr. Straw: I not only congratulate but thank my hon. Friend and many other hon. Friends—some now in the House, some now outside—for the courageous 12-year campaign that they waged to expose that corruption. I also say to the Conservative party through you, Madam Speaker, that for years we were told by the Conservative party that it would condemn Lady Porter's behaviour if and when a court found against that behaviour. On Friday 19 December, a three-judge court, led by the distinguished Lord Justice Rose, found against Lady Porter, declared her to be a liar and confirmed the district auditor's conclusions that she had sought to spend public money gerrymandering a large part of Westminster. I now look forward to the right hon. Member for North–West Cambridgeshire (Sir B. Mawhinney) unequivocally condemning that behaviour at the Dispatch Box.

Police Officers

9. Mr. Allan: What was the total number of police officers in England and Wales in (a) April 1992, (b) March 1997 and (c) September 1997. [20165]

Mr. Michael: There were 127,760 police officers in April 1992. By March 1997, the number had fallen to 127,158; by September, it had fallen again to 126,798. That is a fall of 962 over a five-year period.

Mr. Allan: I note that the Labour party was crafty enough not to give any specific figures for police numbers in its election manifesto, although it spent plenty of time attacking the Conservative Government for the falls that they had brought about.

Is not the Minister concerned about the fact that the Association of Police Authorities believes that his increased settlements for next year will be all but swallowed up in increased salary and pension costs for existing staff? That view is shared by my authority, South Yorkshire, which predicts staff cuts in the face of a 3.8 per cent. increase. Is not the Minister concerned about the fact that that means that next year's settlement will do nothing to reverse the trend of falling numbers?

Mr. Michael: First, ours was an honest response. At the time of the 1992 election, the Conservative party promised an increase of 1,000 in 12 months, but it did not increase the number of police officers by 1,000; it cut the number by 1,000 over five years. Secondly, we did not give figures relating to the number of police officers because, in the Police and Magistrates Courts Act 1994, the Conservative party removed that responsibility from Government, and made it the responsibility of chief constables to decide how many police officers they should employ within the available resources.

In the coming year, police officers in England and Wales will receive an increase in spending power of £258 million. That takes the figure up to £7.15 billion, and represents a 3.7 per cent. increase on the current year. I think that it is a pretty good settlement in the circumstances.

Ms Beverley Hughes: Does my hon. Friend agree that the fall in the number of police officers contrasts starkly with the previous Government's promise to provide thousands of extra officers? Does he further agree that this year's settlement allows police authorities to take some steps towards redressing the imbalance? Is he aware that the absence of police officers on the streets in many parts of the country—including my constituency, where, on estates such as Partington, people are struggling to deal with the consequences of crime—leaves people feeling entirely unprotected?

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend is right. The party opposite—I mean the Conservative party: I should be as precise as the Liberal Democrats would wish me to be—promised to increase police numbers in 1992, failed to do so, and then increased its promise, with no intention of delivering, in the run-up to the election.

The increase in numbers gives chief constables and police authorities resources to increase the amount of work that they do, both directly and with partners such as local authorities, in attempting to cut crime. That is our aspiration—not to put up with the increased crime that we have seen in recent years, but to see a reduction in crime and an increase in the safety of people in their homes and on the streets year on year.

Mr. Greenway: Contrary to what the Minister has just said, chief constables throughout the country—from Wales to Cumbria and the south of England—are already saying, locally and to the press, that they will be forced to employ fewer officers over the next year as a result of the police financial settlement. That is in spite of an increase in the contribution from council tax payers. How many chief constables have suggested to the Minister that a cut in manpower is likely?

There is a common thread: the rural areas are worst affected. Is not this just another example of the Government's blatant disregard for rural interests?

Mr. Michael: That is a pretty desperate attempt by the hon. Gentleman. He asked me specifically how many police constables said that they were about to cut police numbers in the coming year. The answer is none.

Asylum Seekers

10. Mr. Green: What representations he has received on problems relating to Czech and Slovak asylum seekers in Kent. [20166]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Mike O'Brien): There have been numerous representations from various interested parties since the Czech and Slovak asylum seekers began to come in June this year. The major influx has now abated, and we are now concentrating our efforts on resolving the remaining cases. That is made slower and more difficult by the complex asylum system that we inherited from the Conservative Government.

Mr. Green: I thank the Minister for that reply. Will he give the House his latest assessment of the cost of the influx of so-called asylum seekers? Has any progress been made in the fair allocation of that cost? By any standards, this is a national not a local problem, and for the cost to fall exclusively on my constituents and other council tax payers in Kent is manifestly unfair.

Mr. O'Brien: The cost is on-going, but local authorities receive from the Government £140 a week per adult asylum seeker. The council tax payers of Kent contribute, but they will also contribute as income tax payers should there be any further Government money. Last April, the Conservative Government cut the amount available from the Government to Kent and other authorities by some £20 a week per adult asylum seeker. This Government have been more generous to Kent. I have agreed to look at the further help that could be given to Kent by releasing some of its section 11 funding. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me in praising many of the people of Kent for their tolerance and assistance in coping with what is, for a small town such as Dover, quite a large influx of people.

Mr. Prosser: Is my hon. Friend aware that the prompt action that the Government took in reapplying immigration law had a significant effect in reducing the number of asylum seekers coming through the port of Dover, particularly into my constituency? Is he further aware that that action considerably calmed the situation and has removed what could have been an inflammatory problem? Will he contrast the Government's prompt, sensible and rational action with some of the unhelpful suggestions by some Conservative Members—not the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green), I hasten to add—that thousands of asylum seekers and refugees were queuing up to flood into the port of Dover?

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his responsible and statesmanlike approach to a difficult problem for the people of Dover—[Interruption.] Conservative Members may jeer, but they do not understand the seriousness of the problem in Dover, and a number of them have not been terribly helpful in seeking to resolve it. My hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Prosser), who represents his constituency so ably, has dealt with the problem calmly and sensibly, and has worked with the people of Dover and with Kent council to try to cope with the problem. We are grateful to him.

For example, from 2 November until the end of that month, five asylum seekers tried to enter this country from the Czech Republic and Slovakia. The Government's prompt action managed to abate that influx and dealt effectively with the problems that it was causing.

Identity Cards

11. Mr. Campbell-Savours: What proposals he has for a national identity card scheme. [20167]

Mr. George Howarth: We are considering the options, but have no proposals yet to introduce a national identity scheme for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May I ask a simple question: what does the Minister think are the benefits of a national identity scheme?

Mr. Howarth: There is a considerable lobby in favour of a national identity scheme. For example, the police believe that it would assist them in the pursuit of criminals; some believe that it would assist security in the financial sector; and others believe that it would help the retail industry to identify people. Equally, less positive arguments would have to be taken into account before a final decision was made.

Mr. Ian Bruce: The Minister will know that a photo ID card is coming through for driving licences. All the requirements for a driving licence, which virtually all of us carry, are the same as for an ID card, as long as it has a photograph or some other form of positive identification. Will he please give urgent consideration to introducing an ID card?

Mr. Howarth: It may have escaped the hon. Gentleman's attention that on 18 December my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions made an announcement on photo-identity driving licences. They have no other use, nor is any other purpose intended. If, for example, traders chose to use them as proof of identity or to establish that someone was over the age of 17, that would be a useful extension, but it would be voluntary; it would not be the Government's intention.

Mr. Winnick: Is my hon. Friend aware that there is a lobby equally opposed to the introduction of a national identity card scheme, and that those of us who are opposed will have to be persuaded that there is a genuine need for ID cards in a democracy in peacetime? One associates a national identity card scheme more with totalitarian societies. I hope that my hon. Friend will see to it that the Government do not introduce such a card scheme. It is not necessary and would be deeply resented by many people.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend expresses a point of view that is held by many people, and for which there are precedents, but equally strong and perhaps more important views might have to be taken into account. My hon. Friend's views must be balanced against persuasive arguments in the opposite direction.

Police Settlement

12. Mr. Hawkins: What representations he has received on the level of the police settlement for 1998. [20168]

Mr. Straw: Four.

Mr. Hawkins: I thank the Home Secretary for his answer. Does he recognise, despite the carping comments of the Minister of State, that the facts are that in 1996 there were about 16,000 more police officers than in 1979, and about 18,400 more civilians helping them? The Conservative party had a proud record of increasing policing where police were needed. In addition to assisting my area, will the Home Secretary ensure that areas such as South Yorkshire have enough police officers in future to investigate the on-going corruption in Labour local government—for example, in Doncaster?

Mr. Straw: The fact that this time last year 43 representations were made against the police settlement, whereas this year there were only four, suggests that there is widespread confidence in the settlement, and widespread recognition that it was fair to the police and the communities that they serve, especially against the background of an extremely difficult public spending settlement, for which the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends were principally responsible.

Crime (Sussex)

13. Mr. Baker: If he will meet the chief constable of the Sussex police force to discuss levels of crime. [20169]

Mr. Michael: I am always willing to discuss such matters with chief officers, and I do so regularly. I have met the chief constable of Sussex on a number of occasions, both in his role as chief constable and as a representative of the Association of Chief Police Officers. I have met him in the police force area—I recently visited Brighton police station—and I also met him in November at the Home Office.

Mr. Baker: Is the Minister aware that in my constituency there is an epidemic of vandalism? Although there is a drop in the number of other, more serious crimes, all four major towns—Seaford, Polegate, Newhaven and Lewes—are affected by vandalism, which is causing an undue fear of crime among the population at large. What steps will the Minister take to deal with the epidemic of vandalism, as a result of which the windows of one chemist shop in Seaford were smashed seven times in a number of weeks? I saw the chemist on Saturday. Will the Minister speak to his colleagues about the operation of the Crown Prosecution Service, which seems to be reluctant to prosecute anyone whom the police charge with vandalism offences?

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman refers to a number of problems in relation to which we are introducing reforms, specifically in relation to the Crown Prosecution Service. Through the Crime and Disorder Bill, we shall introduce various sentences and the partnership approach, which is intended to address the hon. Gentleman's point that vandalism can build up to the more serious and violent crimes that are the scourge of modern society. Violent crime has increased by 13 per cent. in the Sussex area, and I would not be surprised if the problems to which the hon. Gentleman refers were related to that increase in more serious crimes.

Racial Violence

14. Mrs. Mahon: What recent representations he has received on tackling incidents of racial violence. [20171]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have received 118 responses to the Home Office consultation document on racial violence and harassment. They indicated wide-ranging support for the Government's proposals in the Crime and Disorder Bill to introduce new offences of racially aggravated violence and harassment.

Mrs. Mahon: I assure my hon. Friend that almost everyone welcomes the new proposals. However, will he inform the House when the Stephen Lawrence inquiry will begin? He will be aware that many people—especially those who want to see an end to violence and murder—will follow that inquiry closely.

Mr. O'Brien: The public hearings for the Lawrence inquiry are likely to begin in February. Like my hon. Friend, we are very concerned about the growth in racist crime and violence of which one of the worst manifestations was the murder of Stephen Lawrence. That is why one of the Government's first acts in the Home Office was to arrange a judicial inquiry into that matter. We also hope to secure cross-party support for the measures in the Crime and Disorder Bill to tackle racist crime.

The lives of far too many people are damaged and destroyed by racial harassment and violence, and the Government are determined to crack down on mindless bigotry and thuggery. Some racist criminals may have to learn their lessons behind bars.

Drugs (Prisons)

16. Mr. Spring: What steps he is taking to tackle drugs misuse in prisons; and if he will make a statement. [20174]

Ms Quin: The Government are committed to reducing drugs misuse in prisons. We intend to reduce the supply of drugs in prisons and to provide help to prisoners who misuse, have misused or are at risk of misusing drugs. To help achieve that, I have asked the Prison Service to examine its drug strategy to determine how best to ensure an appropriate balance between security and control measures on the one hand, and treatment and prevention measures on the other. I expect to see the recommendations in April.

Mr. Spring: Given the alarming increase in drugs usage in prisons, will the hon. Lady assure the House that the inquiry will give proper recognition to the entry of drugs into prisons? Many of my constituents who live near prisons and others are concerned about the ease of access to life-threatening and highly addictive drugs in the prison system.

Ms Quin: The hon. Gentleman is right: that is a problem, and we have modified search procedures and other measures to take account of it. At the same time, we must also make as effective as possible the treatment and prevention measures to which I referred.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: Does my hon. Friend agree that many prisoners with drug problems are put on methadone courses, which are causing difficulties? Will he commission an inquiry into the use of methadone in order to determine whether that is the right method for weaning people off drugs?

Ms Quin: I pay tribute to the work that my hon. Friend has done in raising issues related to drugs misuse, which I know is a particular problem in his constituency. Methadone can play a stabilising role, but we need to look carefully at its effects as well as all other aspects, to ensure that we have a balanced treatment programme.

Mr. Malins: If the Minister is determined to stamp out drugs in our prisons, why does not she insist that those who work in prisons—including all prison staff—are subject to the same search procedures as visitors upon entering prisons?

Ms Quin: There is no evidence that that is a particular problem. We must direct our attention to those who work in or visit prisons, such as members of the legal profession and probation officers. We must ensure that search levels are appropriate for those who come into prisons.

Drugs and Crime

17. Mr. Touhig: What plans he has to tackle the link between drugs and crime. [20175]

Mr. George Howarth: My hon. Friend will be aware that there is a specific measure in the Crime and Disorder Bill, which is currently in another place, for a treatment and testing order. That will require prisoners, at the will of the court, to undergo treatment and regular testing, and to be kept under review. It is an issue that we take seriously. We are concerned also that the lessons of the drug prevention initiative on interventions in the criminal justice system should be taken forward.

Mr. Touhig: I welcome my hon. Friend's firm response to the question of the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans). Will he confirm that the Government will firmly oppose the decriminalisation of any controlled substance?

Mr. Howarth: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. If the House or the Government were to send out the message that we were prepared to consider either legalising or decriminalising any currently banned substances, that would be a green light to all the young people and others who do not take drugs to do so. We are certainly not prepared to do that.

3.30 pm

Madam Speaker: We were due to have a statement at this time, to be made by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The statement is ready, but the Opposition spokesman has not yet seen it as there has been a computer breakdown. I shall therefore take a sensible approach and not take the statement now—we shall move on to the Second Reading of the School Standards and Framework Bill. As the Secretary of State for Education and Employment was not aware of this change, he is being brought to the House. I think that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has something to say.

I intend to suspend the sitting for 15 minutes until the Secretary of State arrives at the House. I shall then hear his opening statement, to give the Opposition time to read the statement that will be made by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Dr. John Cunningham): First, Madam Speaker, I accept your ruling. Secondly, I apologise to the House. It could not have been foreseen, however, that at 3 o'clock all the computers in my office would go down. Those who put their faith in technology sometimes have a price to pay, and that was the price.

I fully understand that the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) has not had time to consider a very important statement, and I am content that we should proceed as you recommend, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Thank you, Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Opposition, for the suspension that you propose. As we have been told that the Minister's statement was long in coming, does not what has happened show some incompetence by Ministry? It would have been helpful if we could have been provided with a draft of the statement earlier.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) rose—

Madam Speaker: No, there can be no points of order. I am seeking to be helpful to the House, including the Opposition. I shall suspend the sitting, and we shall resume at 3.45 pm. The statement will be heard after the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has introduced the School Standards and Framework Bill on Second Reading.

3.32 pm

Sitting suspended.

Orders of the Day

School Standards and Framework Bill

3.45 pm

On resuming—

Madam Speaker: I have an agreement from the two Front Benchers that they will complete their introduction of the Second Reading by five o'clock, so that the statement may take place at precisely that time. It will be put on the Annunciator for everyone in the House to see.

Order for Second Reading read.

3.46 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

If anyone is wondering where the beef is, it is in the Bill. [Laughter.] The Bill is the most substantial piece of legislation on education ever brought forward by a Labour Government, and I am very proud indeed to be the Secretary of State who introduces it. Given that it is Christmas week, I wish to take the opportunity to wish you, Madam Speaker, and the House, a happy and contented Christmas, free of leaks and telephone calls from the media, and full of Christmas cheer.

Given the range of goodies in the Bill, it is difficult to know where to start. The Bill is about raising standards; it seeks consensus; it offers a fresh start; it provides a new fervour for lifting horizons in the education system; and it is all about ensuring that teachers have the wherewithal and the power to do their job. Those who carry responsibility—whether as governors, as parents, as teachers, as members of education authorities or as the Secretary of State—need the powers to match rights and duties together.

The Bill is the most comprehensive and widespread measure that has been introduced on standards. It deals not with minutiae, but with the thrust of how we change the relationships in education to emphasise opportunity and equality for all our children. The Bill will match the responsibilities that each and every one of us carries for ourselves with the support necessary and the framework required to make that into a reality. The fulfilment of our promises and pledges commences in the Bill. It builds on the legislation that was given Royal Assent on 31 July to reduce class sizes for all five, six and seven-year-olds to no more than 30.

We will ensure that we begin the process of providing the kind of education for the many that has previously been available only to the few. We will put behind us the divisions and diversions, and the misdirection of time and energy that has been expended on structures rather than standards. The Bill will ensure that we can unite as a House and a nation behind the task of giving every child in our country the chance to succeed, and to contribute for themselves and their families to the prosperity and success of our nation.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): In my constituency, great interest is taken in the Bill. Does my right hon. Friend think that the social exclusion unit will assist him in attaining the objectives outlined in the Bill?

Mr. Blunkett: The work of the social exclusion unit in drawing together a range of Departments, agencies and organisations into a coherent social policy approach will make a substantial contribution to success. It will build on the measures in the Bill which complement and extend the measures in the Education (Schools) Act 1997, passed by the previous Parliament, which ensure that we can tackle head-on the prevention of exclusion and truancy. The Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris) has been working with education authorities, and has announced £22 million of resources to stimulate and support projects to avoid exclusion.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): Before the Secretary of State says any more about uniting the nation, will he establish that the Bill applies to two nations, England and Wales, but not to Scotland? Is it not terribly important that those two nations, if they so wish, can develop distinctive policies, appropriate to their differing circumstances?

Mr. Blunkett: I can confirm that the Bill applies to England and to Wales, and that the clauses which apply to Wales will enable Wales to develop under the new Assembly its own perspective and ethos for education. This will build on the principles in the Bill, and on the principle of raising standards across the United Kingdom.

Education is our top priority, and our success will depend on it. Social cohesion, economic renewal and personal well-being all come from the opportunity to develop the talents of every child and the ability to build on their potential.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): Will my right hon. Friend join me in condemning the Conservative-controlled Cambridgeshire county council which decided last week not to allocate the extra money that the Government have provided for education to the education service? Does he agree that that is a dreadful waste of an opportunity of which the county council is simply not taking advantage?

Mr. Blunkett: As my hon. Friend knows, I have written to every education authority and to the leaders of councils to appeal to them to ensure that the resources announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor on 2 July reach the education system. My right hon. Friend announced that an extra £1 billion would be available for revenue for next year—an average increase of 5.7 per cent. We are asking every council to ensure that the resources are made available, and we will monitor their actions. We recognise that, after 18 years of retrenchment and cuts, it is difficult for councils to balance competing policy pressures. We are mindful of that when asking them to ensure that education is, and will remain, a top priority for all.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): The Secretary of State has commented on Cambridgeshire. Will he also comment on the remarks of the leader of Derbyshire county council, who said:

"We would like nothing more than to pass the cash increase to our schools but it is unrealistic when we are facing a £14 million shortfall in our budget"?

Mr. Blunkett: Of course, that £14 million shortfall arises directly from the way in which Derbyshire was treated under the Conservatives. The Conservatives did not match the standard spending assessment with revenue, as we are doing. The council was treated badly by the Conservatives' refusal to reassess the SSA and the area cost adjustment; that is currently taking place as part of the wider review for 1999. Councils were also treated badly by the Conservatives as they were offered only £200 million nationally for the coming year for education, when we are offering more than £1 billion in extra resources.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): The Secretary of State, frankly, has missed the point of the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin). The Government have announced their proposals for local government finance for next year—this Government, who have now been in office for eight months. Is the Secretary of State saying that the SSA figures fixed by the Government for next year are wrong? Is the right hon. Gentleman not prepared to stand behind the statement made by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions?

Mr. Blunkett: I said nothing of the sort. I said that the review of the allocation of standard spending assessment and area cost adjustment would take shape for 1999, and that, of course, after eight months, county and metropolitan districts and London borough councils are having to reflect on how they pick up the pieces after 18 years. In that respect, Derbyshire is no different from other authorities, except it was in a difficult position because of its relative position in the county council funding league.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Nothing is as straight as it seems when we hear Tories complaining about cuts in local government finance. Is my right hon. Friend aware that, for many years, when the Tory Government were in and we had Labour-controlled local government in Matlock, Derbyshire, the hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) and his hon. Friends, the former Members for Amber Valley, Erewash and Derbyshire, South, used to come to the Chamber not to ask for more money for Derbyshire—their local authority—but to demand that the Tory Secretary of State reduce the amount of money going to their constituents? I have seen hypocrisy and shades of hypocrisy, but I have never heard anything like what has been uttered here today.

Mr. Blunkett: I could not put it better myself.

Mr. Skinner: You're not supposed to.

Mr. Blunkett: Since it is Christmas, I acknowledge fully that I cannot.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Blunkett: I will do so in a moment, but I want to make some progress. Part I of the Bill is a new step forward, which will create a new relationship of professionalism for teachers, building on the Teaching and Higher Education Bill, which is before the House of Lords and which will create: a general teaching council; new induction arrangements for qualified teachers; new inspection arrangements for teaching and for in-service training; a new job description for education authorities; new rights and responsibilities for parents through home-school agreements; a key role for head teachers with the new head teacher qualification; and a new way forward, building on the relationship of families of schools, which will unite primary and secondary schools, and school with school, instead of the previous pretence that we had a pseudo-market in which competition replaced co-operation, and schools were seen to be deliberately attacking their neighbours.

The lower class sizes I mentioned are part of the process, and they are reinforced and reaffirmed in this Bill. The education action zones laid out in clauses 10 to 13 have received wide acclaim. They will enable us to ensure that we can target resources and innovation where they are most needed, in both rural and urban areas, and that we can use the new-found flexibility to find out what works best and to spread it around the rest of the country as time and resources allow.

Clauses 6 and 7 describe the education development plans that education authorities will have to set out, which are linked to the present new early years development programmes. I pay tribute to those authorities that are doing a excellent job and have enabled us to replace the nursery vouchers scheme so smoothly and quickly.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am grateful to the Secretary of State, who has been generous to colleagues in giving way. Surely, all those improvements—as he sees them—need to be financed. What will he tell Dorset county council, which, for every extra £1 that his Department wants it to spend on education, is having to take £1.40 off the care of old people in my constituency? In fact, there has been a real-terms decrease of 2.5 per cent. in the Dorset county council budget, which is probably the lowest budget in the country, anyway.

Mr. Blunkett: The hon. Gentleman's concern is commendable, but his facts are incorrect. The resources that have been allocated for education match, pound for pound, with revenue support, the lift in standard spending assessment. He might not be aware of it, but this is the first time since capping was introduced in the mid-1980s that a Government have matched for a specific service the revenue support with the SSA uplift; that is why we have been able to ask education authorities throughout the country to allocate those resources by taking the difficult decisions that are required to balance the needs of social services and other essential services within their overall budgets.

The role of local education authorities will be inspected, and the new measures in the Bill allow us to intervene directly when we believe that an education authority is failing children and the education service. Instead of hand wringing, which was a familiar sight in the past, we will have the power to take directly whatever steps are necessary to ensure that education authorities deliver our pledges. Clause 8 confers the power to take over specific functions within the education authority, and allows them to be undertaken either by another LEA or by a specific organisation or private concern specified by the Department and myself.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will the Secretary of State confirm that that represents a significant shift in power from local education authorities to the Department, and that the Bill goes further in that respect than any of its predecessors?

Mr. Blunkett: The Conservative Government set up the Funding Agency for Schools, and ran schools directly from the Department; they established what was initially a very rigid national curriculum, which had to be duly watered down and loosened up after the first Dearing inquiry; and they imposed on the education service the most draconian restrictions that we have ever known. The hon. Gentleman has the cheek of the devil to accuse us.

The powers that we are taking are to allow us to match the rhetoric of action with the reality of action. We are able to do what other Governments have pretended that they would like to do, as shown by the previous Secretary of State's intervention in Calderdale and her hand wringing in Nottinghamshire. We have the resources and the power to do something. Those powers balance the correct autonomy at local level with the responsibility to carry out our manifesto pledge to ensure that every child, in whatever local education authority, has the same opportunities.

Intervention in LEAs, as with intervention in schools, will be in inverse proportion to success. If they are working well and doing the job, there will be no interference or direct intervention from the Department; if they are not, we will not simply sit on the sidelines wishing that we could do something about it: we will have the power to act.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): I pay tribute to both the Secretary of State and the Minister for School Standards, who has come to York twice to meet me and the staff and management of the Funding Agency for Schools to discuss the implications of the Bill for the Agency.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that the staff and managers at the Funding Agency for Schools have executive skills—skills in administering education services—that are not available elsewhere in the Department, which is concerned with policy making, not executive functions? Those skills include, for example, capital planning and the administration of the Bill's education action zones and development plans, which ought to be preserved. Will the Department consider how to use those skills in the future, as well as seeking a future use for its offices at Albion wharf in York?

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman and the House know that interventions should be sharp and to the point. More than 40 hon. Members want to speak in the debate. Interventions must be interventions, or hon. Members may not be called when they seek to take part in the debate proper.

Mr. Blunkett: I am delighted that 40 hon. Members wish to speak. I thank them for not going for a drink tonight. I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. It may have been too long, but it was to the point in the issues that he raised on behalf of his constituents.

I confirm that we are mindful of the insecurity and fear among staff at the Funding Agency for Schools and of the need to use their talents, experience and skills to the full in implementing our policies, helping us develop plans for local education and schools, establishing targets, ensuring that we can implement our new deal for school, and investing capital effectively. All those aims will be aided by the expertise that people have gained over the years. I shall ensure that I keep my hon. Friend regularly in touch with what we do in that direction.

Part II deals with issues that relate to the Funding Agency for Schools and to the new framework, which will replace the friction, division and unfairness of the past by drawing together schools of all shapes and sizes into the three new categories in the Bill: community, voluntary and foundation. We listened carefully to the representations made in the consultation. There were 8,500 responses, the greatest number of people and organisations in recent history to respond to a consultative White Paper, including 3,500 from individual parents. We are delighted that people were able and willing to make those representations.

We listened to individuals and organisations, and to the Churches, who told us that they wanted voluntary schools to stay voluntary rather than becoming foundation schools, so as to retain their unique ethos. We were happy to agree. We guaranteed the Churches that their specific role and the ethos of denominational Churches will not be affected. We agreed to make it clear in the Bill that the Secretary of State, rather than the new adjudicator, will be responsible for that area.

I know that some organisations wanted only two categories of school. It has been by building consensus that we have been able to gain support for the new framework to stop the dog fighting, the conflict and the division. It is on that basis that we are moving forward with the new categories, all of which are based entirely on fair funding, on accountability, on inclusiveness of decision-making, and on being part of school planning.

That is also how we are moving forward on the admissions policies through which all schools will play their part in creating a new fairness. Let me spell out, as do clauses 43 to 51, that, from now on, no school will receive additional funding because of its status; such funding will be given only to meet the needs of the children that schools educate.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): While I welcome the Secretary of State's decision on denominational schools, and recognise that he listened carefully to the consultation on them, will he explain why he ignored the responses to the consultation on grant-maintained schools? Is this not a case of "if it isn't broke, don't try to fix it"? Why does he insist on bringing back local authority governors—political placemen of his party—to interfere with the great success of grant-maintained schools?

Mr. Blunkett: In building consensus, we tried to get over such language, which reflects the past. I am delighted that Pauline Latham and George Phipson, the joint chairs of the Grant-Maintained Joint Monitoring Group, which represents 1,200 grant-maintained schools, wrote to me saying:

"We are writing to express our support for the inclusion of a Foundation Category within the School Standards and Framework Bill. It is our belief that the overwhelming majority of current Grant Maintained schools will opt for this category after the Bill has been enacted next year."

It continues:

"GMJMG warmly welcomes the priority which the Government has attached to education. We strongly support the view that education standards should take precedence over school structures."

One cannot get a clearer position than that. I commend the grant-maintained sector for it, because it is looking forward to a new century, not backwards to a divisionist past.

That is the difference between this Government and the previous one. We do not seek conflict; we seek to heal the wounds. We seek to put together a consensus for improvement and change, according to which we can ensure that people can work together rather than against each other; where schools and children are not threatened; and where teachers doing their job are not threatened. Through the extension of local management of schools, we will also seek to ensure that all schools have the opportunity to develop their standards and to determine, through their own autonomy, how they develop. They should be able to use innovation and enterprise to deliver to their children the best possible standards of education.

One of the most difficult things that I will have to do in my time as Secretary of State for Education and Employment is to reunite schools over divided admissions policies. It will be my task and that of my Ministers to draw up new circulars. As we said in our manifesto, we will build on circular 6/93, which was published by the previous Government, to ensure that all children have a chance and are treated fairly in terms of admission to schools.

Part III of the Bill allows me to correct the free-for-all that disadvantaged children, and continues to do so in key areas of the country, whether Watford or Bromley. When considering the shambles of the admissions policy in such areas, I am reminded of the words of the former right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury, Nick Ridley, when he was Secretary of State for Transport. He famously said that he thought that the answer to traffic jams was to do away with traffic lights, on the grounds that, eventually, people would leave their cars at home because they would not be able to get past the end of their street.

If one followed the logic of previous Government's admissions policy to its rightful conclusion, the result would be exactly the same jams and snarl-ups as parents fought one another, regardless of the consequences for other children.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): I am interested in the Secretary of State's comments about including all children in new admission arrangements. Can he therefore explain why he has not sought fit to make it a requirement on all local education authorities to include children with special educational needs? That would make our society, through our maintained schools, a wholly inclusive one.

Mr. Blunkett: The Green Paper we published recently—which the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, my hon. Friend the Member for Yardley dealt with at length in the House a couple of Fridays ago—seeks to include special support where it is necessary and appropriate and will ensure that we design the system to meet the needs of the child rather than the other way round.

I am happy to receive representations about the development of admissions policies that ensure that special needs children are taken into account. Let me go further—I am mindful to hear from people how they believe we can best ensure that over-subscribed schools are able to take children with special needs as well as those who previously had difficulties, and encourage them and help them flourish. That is not always the case, given that the admissions procedures have not always allowed over-subscribed schools to take on that challenge. Instead, those arrangements have tended to divert such children to under-subscribed schools, where places exist in abundance. I look forward to people contributing to that important debate.

Back in June 1995, we spelled out our position on grammar schools. I am able to confirm that the Bill and the criteria I will lay down as part of our admissions policy will remove partial selection where it currently exists. That causes havoc in terms of the admission of local children, and denies fairness to parents because of the lack of choices and opportunities open to them.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): I am most grateful to the Secretary of State for giving way, as he has been generous with his time. As he says that people are fighting over places, could he explain why, given that Bromley gives places to nearly 3,500 secondary pupils and nearly 1,500 primary school pupils from outside the borough, he has not reversed the Greenwich ruling?

Mr. Blunkett: The hon. Lady raised that question with me in a slightly different form during questions on education and employment—it seems a long time ago, but was only about 10 days ago. I shall give her the answer: we are not against the exercise of a parental preference; we are against situations in which, for no other reason than the partial selection system and because parents are exercising their preference from a distance, local parents living in close proximity to a school in, for example, Bromley, find it impossible to get their children into it.

[Mr. Blunkett]

I have made it clear several times that we are not prepared to overturn the Greenwich judgment. It is specifically, although not exclusively, a London problem, and we want London boroughs to co-operate to begin to ensure that we can make sense out of what is currently a shambles.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): The Secretary of State has been more than helpful in trying to resolve the problems that we have in Southend-on-Sea, where four people's grammar schools take 25 per cent. of the children, and where, despite high unemployment and many social problems, we have higher educational achievements overall than any other part of Essex.

However, will the right hon. Gentleman make it clear that, as long as local primary school parents are in favour of the continuation of those four grammar schools, they will be permitted to continue? As he considers that, will he bear in mind the appalling situation in Glasgow, where I used to live, where they had the most dreadful education results ever recorded, partly because all the selective schools there were abolished?

Mr. Blunkett: The fact of whether there is selection or non-selection does not affect the standard of education, which depends on the teaching in the classroom, the holistic work of the school, the development of links with the community, the support of parents, and the work which, I accept, needs to be done with parents whose interest in, and commitment to, education is so variable.

I can confirm to the hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) that, in the case of individual grammar schools, parents of children at the appropriate feeder and primary schools will make the decision. Only where 20 per cent. of the parents in those individual grammar schools wish to trigger a ballot will a ballot take place.

I want to make it clear this afternoon that a disparate admissions policy makes it more, rather than less, difficult for the teachers to do their job in balancing able and less able children with different aptitudes. That is why we are establishing an adjudicator, who will complement the criteria on admissions and help to ensure that a smooth change is achieved, and that, where there is disagreement at local level, there will be a right of appeal on policy matters.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): My right hon. Friend will know that democratic socialists, almost by definition, are opposed to grammar schools, and that many of us would vote to close them tomorrow because we believe that they completely undermine education in our constituencies, particularly where they exist near our constituencies. Does my right hon. Friend look forward to some time in the future when, under a Labour Government, those infernal institutions will have disappeared for ever, and we will be able to look forward to a secondary system in this country that feeds equality to all?

Mr. Blunkett: I am grateful for that very enjoyable question. Perhaps the best way I can answer it is to quote directly from our document "Diversity and Excellence", which I published on the day that the previous Prime Minister resigned to stand against himself in June 1995—two and a half years ago:

> "Our opposition to academic selection at 11 has always been clear, but while we have never supported grammar schools in their exclusion of children by examination, change can only come through local agreement. Such change in the character of a school would only follow a clear demonstration of support from the parents affected by such decisions."

That principle is embodied in the Bill and in the criteria that I shall lay down; it is in our manifesto, and I shall carry it out to the letter.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): I am grateful to the Secretary of State, who has been extremely generous in giving way. In view of the shifting sand that is the Government's policy on selection, will the right hon. Gentleman take this opportunity to explain to the House his understanding of the difference in meaning between the words ability and aptitude?

Mr. Blunkett: It is the same meaning that was built into the previous Government's legislation and the criteria laid out in DfEE circular 6/93. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the previous Secretary of State, who will no doubt enlighten him. The adjudicator that I shall establish will ensure that aptitude is not used as a cover for selection. That is why we are establishing the adjudication system.

The whole thrust of what we are doing is to improve standards, and I am pleased to announce that we are notifying education authorities today of the next tranche of resources relating to our standards fund. The additional £59 million will include £49 million to establish in-service training for teachers and new literacy co-ordinators, and to purchase books. There will be an extra £4 million for the excellent work that the Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells) is doing on family literacy, which, as I said, is so crucial to our success in achieving progress.

We are allocating £3 million to extend the premier league initiative for after-school and homework centres, so that division one clubs in England can also participate. I look forward to the possibility in the near future of rugby league and rugby union clubs participating, although some good rugby league clubs, including Sheffield Eagles, are already doing an excellent job of work in helping children out of school hours. Finally, £3.3 million will be used to help reading recovery for pupils transferring from primary to secondary school; we all remember that the previous Government did away altogether with national funding for the reading recovery scheme.

This afternoon, we have an opportunity to spell out the Government's unequivocal commitment to the task of healing our education system, fostering innovation and ensuring that people have the power to act sensibly in making those aims come alive in their own schools and communities. The Bill will ensure that 14 and 15-year-olds can legally take part in work experience, and so enable them to develop their contact with the world of work while remaining within school and benefiting from GCSE, GNVQ1 and the experiments that are taking place in further education.

The Bill takes an holistic approach. We are reinstating nutritional standards in school meals 17 years after the Tory Government withdrew them. We are overcoming silly anomalies so that schools can provide free school milk, and provide it at any time of the day, rather than being subject to the nonsense that exists under current law. We are ensuring that capability procedures for teachers are tough but fair. We are making it possible to co-ordinate what is happening between schools and colleges and between school and school. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and his colleagues will also be able to do so.

The Bill sets behind us two decades of muddle and dissension, and builds on the progress that we have made in the past eight months in reinvigorating, re-motivating and bringing new morale to the education service. I offer this Christmas as a new beginning for the education service, and I look forward to everyone of good will working with us to implement it on behalf of our children.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Before I call the next speaker, I advise the House that Madam Speaker has decided that the 10-minutes rule will apply to all Back-Bench speeches this evening.

4.24 pm

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I start by joining the Secretary of State in wishing you, as occupant of the Chair, and the whole House a happy Christmas. That is something which does not divide those on the Front Benches in this debate.

However, my right hon. and hon. Friends will vote against Second Reading, because the Bill does not deliver the things that the Secretary of State claimed for it and because—even worse—in important respects it actively undermines the delivery of higher school standards and better prospects for British schoolchildren.

In the White Paper "Excellence in Schools", published in July 1997, the Secretary of State began to set out his policies for schools. The White Paper set out some policy principles, which we should compare with the detail of the Bill that the House is asked to consider today.

In the White Paper the Secretary of State said that he regarded standards as more important than structure. He repeated that proposition today, but the Bill is not, as he sought to argue, focused on the delivery of standards. The Bill is the centrepiece of another major restructuring of the educational framework. That is why it is called the School Standards and Framework Bill. Fifty-five of the 124 clauses of the Bill marshalled together in part II of the Bill set out, as the title of the part makes clear, a "new framework for maintained schools".

It is not true to say that the Bill does not deal with school structure.

The fifth principle set out in the White Paper was:

"There will be zero tolerance of underperformance" and the sixth principle was:

"Government will work in partnership"—

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): The right hon. Gentleman skipped over that one a bit quickly.

Mr. Dorrell: I am coming back to it. I am putting the two together in the interests of brevity:

"zero tolerance of underperformance" and

"Government will work in partnership with all those committed to raising standards."

Yet the Bill abolishes grant-maintained schools. It establishes a machinery for abolishing grammar schools. How does that square with the principle that the Government will work with those who are committed to raising standards in British schools? This is not "zero tolerance of underperformance"; it is zero tolerance of high performance.

Another principle set out in the White Paper is that "Intervention will be in inverse proportion to success"—

yet the Bill establishes, by means of the education development planning process and a myriad of other planning processes, a centralised planning structure giving unprecedented powers to the holder of the Secretary of State's office, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) pointed out. This is not a Bill that delivers intervention in inverse proportion to success, but a Bill that provides the Secretary of State with unprecedented powers to intervene across the board in the British school system.

Most important, the White Paper sought to argue that this gave effect to the Government's priority area. When asked what is the Government's priority, the Prime Minister is wont say, "Education, education, education," yet it is now obvious that that claim has no clothes.

During the general election campaign, the Prime Minister repeatedly said that he sought to deliver the increased emphasis on education that he wanted his Government to provide, by reducing expenditure elsewhere on welfare. On the launch of the Labour party manifesto on 3 April, the Prime Minister said:

"Education will be our number one priority; and we will increase the share of national income spent on education as we decrease it on the bills of economic and social failure".

That is what the Prime Minister said on 3 April, and he repeated it time and again during the election campaign.

But now we know the truth. This was a strategy with no detail attached to it—certainly no detail to which the present Secretary of State for Education and Employment was signed up. We have seen how signed up to these principles he feels, in the memorandum that was leaked to yesterday's edition of The Sunday Telegraph. In that memorandum, the Secretary of State's argument is: "Of course I understand the need for reform of the welfare system; it is just that I agree with almost none of the principles that the Treasury and the Department of Social Security are discussing."

I was a Treasury Minister in the last Government at one point, and any Treasury Minister is familiar with the Secretary of State's argument. Since the dawn of time, colleagues throughout Whitehall have written to Treasury Ministers, "We agree wholeheartedly with the general principle that you are trying to pursue, but we disagree with the specific proposition that is being considered." [Interruption.]

The Secretary of State asks what this has to do with the Bill. Every schoolmaster and schoolmistress—every teacher working in the system—would say that, if we are to improve standards in British schools, the Secretary of State's key priority must be to deliver extra resources.

[Mr. Dorrell]

The key to success in the delivery of that objective, according to the Prime Minister, is to release resources elsewhere in the system, because that is the only way in which he sees extra money going into British schools. We know, however, that the Secretary of State is now resisting the very process that the Prime Minister said was the key to delivering extra resources.

The Secretary of State knows very well that the argument set out in yesterday's edition of The Sunday Telegraph is central to the delivery of his responsibilities. He asks, "What has this to do with the Bill?", but he knows the answer very well. He knows that the answer is that, unless the Government can deliver the welfare reform that he opposes in particular, he will not have the resources to deliver on his rhetoric about school standards.

Mr. Ian Bruce: I am sure that my right hon. Friend was somewhat disappointed by the Secretary of State's reply to my intervention. The right hon. Gentleman did not appear to know that, for every pound in the increase in Dorset's standard spending assessment, £1.40 was taken away from disabled people and the social services budget. Surely he realises that the increase is a con trick of smoke and mirrors. There are no extra resources; resources are being taken away from other local government services.

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Virtually all the increase in resources provided in the Government's plans for local authorities as a whole have been claimed as an increase in the education SSA, but that will be a realistic interpretation of the facts only if every other local government service—social services being far the most important—delivers a totally unrealistic budget for next year as compared with this year.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North): If the right hon. Gentleman believes that increased resources are the only way to improve education, why did he spend the last 18 years in government cutting education spending in my authority?

Mr. Dorrell: During those 18 years, we saw increases year by year in the resources available to British schools. Furthermore, we never claimed—and I have not claimed today—that it is only about resources. It is also about structure. That is why I shall go on to argue that the changes in structure that form the centrepiece of the Bill are changes in the wrong direction.

It would not, however, be right to claim that every aspect of the Bill is unwelcome. I welcome some aspects—for instance, the priority that the Government give education. That is not new, of course; it is a commonplace of prime ministerial speeches. It has been so since the days of Lord Callaghan, Lady Thatcher and my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), and the present incumbent has continued the tradition. It is a cliché, but none the less a welcome cliché, that education is a high priority to any Government. I agree with the Government about that.

I also welcome the fact that the Government are committed to continuing the testing regime and the publication of those tests, which we introduced in the teeth of opposition from the Labour party. The Secretary of State now recognises that it is an important element of keeping the system open and accountable to parents and the wider community. I very much welcome the fact that the Government are committed to those principles.

I also welcome the elements in the Bill that deal with education action zones. Anyone looking at the publicity which the Secretary of State secured when the Bill was published could be forgiven for thinking that the Bill was almost exclusively about education action zones. The four clauses devoted to that subject are broadly welcome as they represent an important element in improving education in difficult parts of the country.

However, I hope that the Minister will clarify one aspect of those four clauses when he winds up. Clause 13 allows an education action zone to opt out of the national arrangements for school teachers' pay and conditions. This is exactly the same Bill which withdraws those rights from grant-maintained schools that have hitherto had the right.

I should be glad to know why the Government are providing to schools within education action zones exactly the same right that they are removing from today's grant-maintained schools. It was right that grant-maintained schools had such an option, and I certainly do not oppose it in the context of grant-maintained schools. I simply oppose its withdrawal from schools which currently have the right to opt out of those conditions.

Mr. Blunkett: How many?

Mr. Dorrell: The Minister asks how many. That question is not relevant. He proposes to provide that opportunity for schools in education action zones, presumably because he is persuaded by the argument of allowing individual schools greater flexibility around teachers' pay and conditions. I agree with him about that, but do not understand why he wants to focus it on a few schools and not, to use the Government's rhetoric, on "schools for the many".

I wish to dwell on one aspect of the Bill, because I find it rather better than I had expected. I refer to clauses 90 to 94 on selection. The Secretary of State has always had interesting things to say about selection, although not all of them are totally compatible with each other. Lord Hattersley attributed to the right hon. Gentleman the phrase, "Read my lips: no selection by examination or interview." I should be interested to know whether the Secretary of State wishes to deny it—he has never sought to do so. That was alleged to be his policy.

A couple of years ago, at the Labour party conference, the Prime Minister said:

"No return to selection, academic or social."

I presume that that was before he chose the school to which his children now go. At the beginning of this year, the Secretary of State was also pretty clear on the subject. He said:

"We are not intent on extending further the selective process."

During the election campaign, the Deputy Prime Minister said:

"We are not in favour of selection."

There are a number of different nuances, but right up to election day, the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) could reasonably have expected those on the Labour Front Bench to be clear in their opposition at least to the extension of selection, and occasionally to the principle.

It would be untrue to say that there has been a flash of blinding light, but there appears to be a flickering dawn of realisation on the part of the Government that that is incompatible with their commitment to high standards and to working in partnership with those who share that commitment. The relevant clauses start unambiguously enough. Clause 90 says:

"No admission arrangements . . . may make provision for selection by ability unless"— and then lists a range of exceptions. I suspect that some will have been expected by Labour Back-Benchers, although not with much enthusiasm, as the Government made it clear before election day that they would allow, with considerable—and from my point of view, unwelcome—restrictions, the continued operation of at least some grammar schools.

Clause 91 makes it clear that, where existing selective arrangements are in place in schools that are not grammar schools, there is no statutory bar on that, so we are making a further step forward. Clause 92 allows selection in the context of banding arrangements, but clause 93 is one of the most interesting—certainly one of the most hopeful—clauses in the Bill, because it allows selection of up to 10 per cent. of school population by aptitude in any school where the admission authority is satisfied that that school has a specialism.

I hope that the Minister will make it crystal clear that any foundation school and any voluntary-aided school within the terms of the Bill is its own admission authority. Therefore, if I read the Bill correctly, the governing body of any voluntary aided school or any foundation school has it within its power to determine that it is a school with a specialism, and to select up to 10 per cent. of the school population by aptitude for that specialism, within the terms of clause 93.

Mr. Byers indicated assent.

Mr. Dorrell: The Minister nods in assent, and I am pleased that he does, because I regard that as a significant further break in the ice of Labour's hitherto blanket hostility to the principle of selection. I welcome the further break-up of that iceberg.

Mr. Byers: For the record, I was nodding my head to indicate that I would reply in detail to those points when I wind up the debate.

Mr. Dorrell: I look forward to listening to what the Minister says in detail. If my interpretation of the clause is right, it allows an opportunity for schools to develop greater specialism and diversity, and to deliver the commitment that the Government claim to improving the quality of education available to British schoolchildren.

If that development of policy is welcome, the same cannot be said of the treatment of grammar schools in the Bill. Clauses 95 to 97 establish the machinery for the abolition of grammar schools. That will please the hon. Member for Workington, but it will not please anyone anywhere in the country who wants to provide the opportunity for children from whatever background to improve themselves, and to offer the best possible ladder to opportunity and improved chances in life.

The Government's attitude to grammar schools has several aspects that stand out. One is that they still see it unambiguously as a one-way ratchet, despite their dawning, flickering realisation on some issues. The partnership that they claim with those who are committed to improving schools is a partnership only with those who currently have grammar schools. Despite all the rhetoric about diversity, they offer no opportunity for a particular area or community to introduce a grammar school structure if it chooses to do so. I do not understand the logic that enables a Government to allow the continued existence of grammar schools in one area, but not to allow their introduction in another.

All the detail of this passage, as the Secretary of State will acknowledge, is to be set out. We shall oppose these clauses when they come up in Committee, because we think that they are wrong-headed. I seek from the Minister when he winds up this evening a commitment that the draft regulations, which will be the teeth of these clauses, will be published in good time, so that we have them before we discuss the clauses in Committee.

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): Will the right hon. Gentleman tell the House whether, in a particular set of circumstances, if parents had voted for the closure of a grammar school, he would think it right or wrong for a Secretary of State to adhere to the views of local people?

Mr. Dorrell: What I think is wrong is for the Government to introduce a set of clauses that are so one-sided that they provide only a one-way ratchet.

That is not the only, or even the main, act of vandalism in the Bill. At its heart are the 55 clauses to which I have referred, which deal with the new framework for schools. They have a simple purpose: to abolish grant-maintained schools. The cornerstone—the sine qua non—of the Bill is to abolish the locally managed grant-maintained schools that have been developing in our system over the past few years.

That is why this is a bad Bill, and it is the most important reason why we shall oppose it this evening. It reveals that all the talk of a commitment to work with those who are committed to high standards is simply humbug. Let us look at the record of grant-maintained schools.

For A-levels, half of the top 100 schools in Britain are grant-maintained schools. The top three places are held by grant-maintained schools. For GCSE, the proportion of pupils achieving five or more A to C grades is 53 per cent. in grant-maintained schools, and 40 per cent. in the rest of the maintained sector. According to evidence published by the Secretary of State less than one month ago, 240 schools have improved for four years running in terms of their published results. Of those, one third are grant-maintained schools. Eight out of 20—40 per cent.—of the top 20 schools are grant-maintained schools. That sector accounts for 6 per cent. of the total number of schools in the system.

Mr. Blunkett: Twenty per cent. of secondary schools.

Mr. Dorrell: The Secretary of State says from a sedentary position 20 per cent. of secondary schools.

[Mr. Dorrell]

That is true, and shows that grant-maintained schools are performing roughly twice as well as the rest of the maintained sector.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, with the best will in the world, and being as generous as possible to local education authorities, they have a much wider range of perceived responsibilities than individual schools; that grant-maintained schools have frequently, in my area at least, put the interests of their pupils at the head of their priorities; and that, as a consequence of taking themselves out of the local education authority's straitjacket, grant-maintained schools have been able to perform a great deal better than they would otherwise have done?

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend is precisely right. Why have grant-maintained schools delivered such performance? It is as my hon. Friend says: because their responsibility is focused within the school, they are free from excessive intervention from elsewhere in the system, and they can fulfil their responsibility to deliver standards to the children in those schools.

Mr. Blunkett: If one gives a school more money, extensions of its buildings, and the power to choose whichever pupils it wishes, is it not possible that the school might do better?

Mr. Dorrell: The Secretary of State is hunting for excuses. As he well knows, the funds available to grant-maintained schools were determined by reference to the other schools in the area in which that grant-maintained school was working. The Secretary of State is not prepared to face the facts about the improved performance of the education system that has been delivered by having responsibility focused within the individual school.

The abolition of local management in the grant-maintained sector, and the taking of power back into the hands of the local education authority—and even worse, into the hands of the Department for Education and Employment—is the change that goes to the heart of the Bill.

We believe that schools are local institutions that should be accountable to the community and responsive to the needs of the children in them. The result of the development of that policy has been a diverse and flexible system. That, among other reasons, is why I support the Secretary of State in his commitment to develop selection by aptitude in order to allow a more diverse, flexible system. I look forward to hearing the Minister explaining that policy from the Dispatch Box later this evening.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: If grant-maintained schools are so wonderful, can the right hon. Gentleman explain why the majority of Conservative Back Benchers send their children to public schools and totally bypass the state education system?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman has scored a spectacular own goal. My right hon. and hon. Friends want to see a diverse system which includes support for those children who wish to enter the independent education system. If the hon. Gentleman seriously wanted to introduce a unified system, he should not have voted against the abolition of the assisted places scheme.

Integral to the Government's vision of centralisation of power are those passages in the Bill that deal with education development plans. The Secretary of State says, quite rightly, that every school should have a plan for the development of the service it delivers. However, the Secretary of State then goes off the rails. He believes that, because each school must have a plan, it must be accountable to the local education authority for all the key details of that plan. The local education authority is then accountable to the Secretary of State for the delivery of the key details of that plan.

The planning structure that the Secretary of State has erected in this Bill resembles nothing so much as the orthodoxy of 1960s economic planning structures. According to the structure established by the Secretary of State, everything throughout the school system is accountable not within the school—as should occur in a local institution—or even to the local education authority, but, through the planning structure, to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Willis rose—

Mr. Dorrell: If the hon. Gentleman, as a Liberal Democrat, is true to the traditions of liberal local democracy, he should be as opposed as anyone to the nationalisation of the school system that the Secretary of State is introducing.

Mr. Willis: I apologise for attempting to make my point so impolitely. Was not the introduction of the national curriculum by the previous Conservative Government a gross act of centralisation the like of which we had not seen before?

Mr. Dorrell: I do not agree. I was talking about the planning structure and, as I have given an undertaking to sit down at five o'clock, I invite the hon. Gentleman to consider the terms of clauses 7 and 8. They give the Secretary of State responsibility for approving every local education authority plan. Local education authorities will be required to change the plans if the Secretary of State does not agree with them. The Secretary of State will have the power to change the plans and, even if he does not change them, he has a duty—not merely the power—to monitor the discharge of those plans by local education authorities.

The power that the Bill affords to the Secretary of State for Education resembles nothing so much as the power that the Health Secretary has to intervene directly in appointed local health authorities. Accountability for the health service in this country has always been through the Secretary of State to the House. However, accountability in the school system is not to an appointed local education authority but to a locally elected education authority.

In this Bill, the Secretary of State removes all the checks from the British school system and makes himself accountable for every detail of what goes on in that system. If the Bill is passed as presently drafted, the Secretary of State will have nowhere to hide: he will be responsible from the Government Dispatch Box for the services delivered in British schools in the same way as his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health—his comrade in arms against the Chancellor of the Exchequer—is accountable for what goes on in an avowedly national health service.

That point is emphasised by the terms of clause 8 which, for the first time, give the Secretary of State the power to issue instructions directly to the staff of a local education authority over the heads of elected councillors. The Bill will grant that new power to nationalise our school system. I can think of no better way of summing up my reservations about the Bill than by quoting the words of the Minister for School Standards. On 2 March 1993, the then hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Byers), referring to a clause in the Conservative's Education Bill, said:

"It starkly demonstrates the way in which power is being concentrated in the hands of the Secretary of State. It does not give power to schools, governors or parents; it gives power to the holder of the office of Secretary of State for Education. It represents one of the most dramatic extensions of Whitehall power since 1945."—[Official Report, 2 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 178-9.]

The Minister has summed up this situation accurately: his words have become a boomerang that has hit his right hon. Friend directly between the eyes.

The Bill is about not school standards, but school bureaucracy. How else can the Government explain the provisions in the Bill regarding not just education development plans but school organisation plans? I shall detain the House for a moment on the Bill's proposals in that regard. School organisation plans seem to be constituted according to a formula that has not been used since they drew up the constitution of the Holy Roman Empire.

Clause 25 gives each local education authority responsibility for preparing a school organisation plan. That plan is then considered by a school organisation committee, the membership of which is unclear but the decisions of which must be unanimous. If the committee fails—through some mischance—to reach a unanimous decision, the adjudicator is called in to decide what the plan should be. The local education authority remains responsible for carrying out the plan—unless the Secretary of State intervenes under the terms of schedule 7, in which case he may offer another set of proposals that presumably compete with those of the adjudicator. There must then be a public inquiry, but it must find in a manner consistent with the Secretary of State's ruling. That is an extraordinary way of confusing responsibility and producing a diffuse system of responsibility for school organisation.

As is often the case with the present Government, the aspirations to high quality education are not wrong, but the Secretary of State has failed totally to translate his words into anything resembling action. The Bill does not promise improvements in education—still less does it live by the excellent principles set out in the Secretary of State's White Paper, such as intervention being in inverse proportion to success and working in conjunction, in co-operation and in partnership with those who are committed to higher standards in education. The Bill delivers centralisation of power on the local education authority and on the office of the Secretary of State. It also delivers tier upon tier of new bureaucracy—education development plans, plans to reduce class sizes, early years development plans and school organisation plans.

The piece de resistance at the end of the Bill is the home-school contract for every school. [Interruption.] Labour Members cheer that proposal. Schools are obliged to go through a preparation process, a consultation process and an adjustment process regarding the new home school contracts. What do such contracts amount to at the end of that process? The answer is: not a row of beans. The contracts are unenforceable, and they will influence the actions of neither the school nor the parents.

Mr. Vernon Coaker (Gedling): The purpose of home-school contracts is to try to ensure that parents take responsibility for their children's education and that they work in partnership with schools to achieve the best for their children. In the past few years, schools have been unable to work as closely as they should with parents. That is the point of home-school contracts.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that it would be desirable to have home-school contracts which influence parents and make them more supportive regarding what goes on in schools and which bind schools more closely with parents. I agree whole-heartedly with that idea. However, I cannot understand how that objective will be delivered by requiring schools to go through a hugely bureaucratic process and not allowing them any means of securing the changes in parental behaviour that the hon. Gentleman seeks. The Bill makes it crystal clear that those pieces of paper will not be allowed to influence the way in which any individual acts. What is the point of having a contract that has no influence over the actions of individuals?

The one thing that the Bill does not promise, as the Secretary of State made clear in his sedentary interjection earlier in my speech, is more money. That is the one thing that head teachers and staffroom teachers throughout Britain are looking to the Government, including the Secretary of State, to deliver so as to put flesh on the bones of the Government's rhetoric.

I see that the Secretary of State for Health has joined us in the Chamber. The right hon. Gentleman is a comrade in arms in the opposition to delivering the specific changes that the Prime Minister sees as the only means of delivering the improvement that the right hon. Gentleman wants for the health service and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment wants for schools. When the history of the next three months is written, it will not be the Bill and its consideration in Committee that will be remembered. Instead, history will focus on the Secretary of State's failure to deliver his much-trumpeted 5.7 per cent., and that is what we shall be monitoring in the months ahead.

BSE

5 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Dr. John Cunningham): With permission, Madam Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the beef industry and on BSE and its consequences, but first I repeat my earlier apology to you and to Members on both sides of the House for the problem that occurred with the computers in my office earlier today, which necessitated the postponement of the statement. I recognise that that postponement has not been convenient for right hon. and hon. Members, and I give my unreserved apology for that happening.

Many UK beef producers face exceptional difficulties including closed export markets, the need to adjust to BSE-related controls and low prices.

The House will be aware that livestock producers have demonstrated at ports and elsewhere over recent weeks. Some demonstrations have involved interference with trade and, in one case, the destruction of a consignment. Such action will not be tolerated here.

The Government have already committed very large sums to supporting the beef industry. All told, some £2 billion was paid in 1996-97, and we expect to spend some £1.4 billion in 1997-98. These are very large sums indeed. They cannot be maintained indefinitely.

There is over-supply of beef throughout Europe, and a long-term decline in consumption of beef everywhere. The Government are convinced of the need for substantial restructuring of the European industry. The European Commission also recognises that restructuring is vital, and has proposed radical changes to the EU beef regime in the framework of Agenda 2000. The Government strongly agree and believe that the restructuring needs to start now. In the interests of consumers, taxpayers, the environment and not least farmers themselves, we must reform the beef industry so that it becomes economically and environmentally sustainable.

Our long-term aim should be to reduce the scale of the subsidy to producers. That is what we shall continue to argue for in Brussels. As BSE is eliminated from the UK cattle herd, the current very high levels of taxpayers' support will also inevitably be wound down.

In future, there will be fewer producers but a more viable beef industry in the UK and Europe generally. It is essential for UK producers to plan now on the basis that major changes will come about. In the long run, such structural change will be beneficial for the industry and for the economy as a whole. The Government are committed to bringing it about as quickly as possible.

The Government therefore now intend to open early consultations with the farming industry to achieve the restructuring that is essential. In that context, we shall explore whether the EU's early retirement scheme and other EU structural measures can play a part in achieving the Government's objectives in the longer term.

Also with a view to restructuring, the Commission has proposed as part of Agenda 2000 that consideration be given to the overlap between less-favoured areas and areas of high nature value, and to the scope for transforming the related support scheme—which in the UK, is delivered via hill livestock compensatory allowances—into an instrument to maintain and to promote low-input farming. The Government support the Commission's efforts to replace HLCAs, which are production-linked payments, with instruments better designed to deliver environmental benefits. The Government intend to review the existing HLCA scheme with those objectives in mind.

While restructuring is necessary and desirable, it should occur as a result of careful, rational decisions by those concerned. Present circumstances are not conducive to such a process. Producers are under intense pressure, and any restructuring brought about now might not be well founded. Accordingly, there is a strong case for exceptional, one-off help. That will give producers time to prepare for the future, but I must emphasise that those payments are exceptional and one off.

Subject to consultation with the European Commission, I therefore propose to utilise £60 million for the beef sector from the EU compensation available to offset the effects of sterling green rate revaluations; it will be distributed mostly via extra payments for suckler cows. Most of the benefit will go to hill farmers. The payments are 100 per cent. EU funded, although such payments are subject to the Fontainebleau mechanism.

I also propose to increase hill livestock compensatory allowances by £25 million for 1998 only, the increase to be divided equally between beef and sheep. About 25 per cent. of the payments are funded by the EU, but that is also subject to the Fontainebleau mechanism. By any test, £85 million of additional support is substantial.

Let me reiterate the Government's aim for agriculture policy. It is to change fundamentally the narrow producer focus of the present common agriculture policy, to decouple support from production, to work for sustainable farming and to give consumers, taxpayers and the environment greater priority.

I turn now to even more serious matters. As the House knows all too well, BSE has had the gravest human consequences. The scientific data we now have provide convincing evidence that the agent that causes BSE is the same as that which causes the new variant of Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease. That dreadful disease has already cost the lives of more than 20 people, most of them young adults. The Government feel the deepest sympathy with their families. Naturally they want to know how their loved ones came to contract a fatal disease. BSE has also threatened the livelihood of thousands of people throughout the farming and food industries; it has cost the taxpayer huge sums; and it has caused considerable difficulties in our international relations. It has been, literally, a disaster.

The Government agree with those who have been arguing that a national human tragedy of this importance, taken together with the economic and other disruption that has ensued, requires a full, independent assessment. We have a responsibility to the country to take a reasoned look at how circumstances developed in this disastrous manner.

Events since the parliamentary statements on 20 March 1997, Official Report, columns 716-17, have been, and continue to be, the subject of extensive political and media attention, and have to some extent obscured the initial chain of developments through which BSE emerged. For all those reasons, the Government have decided to institute an inquiry into the emergence of bovine spongiform encephalopathy and new-variant Creutzfeldt-Jacob disease. The Government have accordingly asked

Lord Justice Phillips to carry out a non-statutory inquiry into the emergence and identification of BSE and new-variant CJD and the action taken in response to it up to 20 March 1996, and to report within a year. Its terms of reference are:

"To establish and review the history of the emergence and identification of BSE and new-variant CJD in the United Kingdom and of the action taken in response to it up to 20 March 1996; to reach conclusions on the adequacy of that response, taking account of the state of knowledge at the time; and to report on these matters by 31 December 1998 to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Secretary of State for Health and the Secretaries of State for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland."

I am setting out fuller details of the inquiry in a separate written answer today. Let me emphasise again that the aim is not to reopen old wounds. [Laughter.] One would hardly have thought that laughter was appropriate to such a serious matter. Nor is the aim to make party political capital. As I have said, it is to discover the facts, to take a reasoned look at how matters came to pass and to learn the necessary lessons for the future.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has written to the Leader of the Opposition inviting his support for the inquiry, and to Lord Callaghan, Baroness Thatcher and the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) about the release of papers of their Administrations to the inquiry.

Following long-standing conventions on access to papers of a previous Administration, present Ministers will play no part in the presentation of evidence by their officials to the inquiry. The Government would, in any case, not expect to comment on the course of the inquiry until we have received Lord Justice Phillips's report. The Government will answer to the House in the normal way for any action following that report.

The Government intend to work closely with the beef industry to resolve its difficulties. The Government also seek the co-operation of all those involved in the circumstances surrounding the emergence of BSE and new-variant CJD to ensure that we learn all the lessons we can from the disaster. We owe it to the families involved, to the public at large and to our future generations. I commend this statement to the House.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): May I first thank you, Madam Speaker, for your courtesy in affording us the suspension of the House while we considered the statement that eventually arrived from the Minister? While we all have sympathy for computer problems, we should not forget that the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will be running the new computerised cattle database.

Given that we have been talking about today's statement for the best part of a week and that British agriculture has been in a state of crisis for much longer than that, I find it quite staggering that the Minister could not have produced the statement before his computers failed. Perhaps he should not have moved them to his sumptuous premises in Smith square.

The first question we must ask ourselves is whether the statement was worth waiting for. For anyone who knows or understands anything about British agriculture, the short answer is an unreserved no. By its third page, the statement has painted a chilling picture for the British beef industry. Does the Minister acknowledge that it is now policy to cut the size of the British beef industry—just when many farmers are scraping and scrimping to stay in it?

The statement says that the Minister wishes to bring forward the rundown of the industry as quickly as possible. Does he agree that, in relation to Europe, he wants us to do it unilaterally? Does he further agree that his proposal to allow the United Kingdom industry to restructure Europe's beef industry is effectively exporting agricultural jobs to mainland Europe? Is not his package of the 90th review—the early retirement scheme—the first example of Labour's work-to-welfare programme?

I was a third of the way through the statement before I found any mention of help for the United Kingdom agricultural sector and beef in particular. It is a travesty for the Minister to tell the House that he is giving £85 million to the beef and sheep industry. At the last agriculture Question Time, the Minister gave me a straightforward no. He said that there would be no more money for agriculture because there was no more money. So where is the money coming from?

The Minister says that he is giving £85 million to the industry. How can that be? Does he agree that, with higher meat hygiene charges of £44 million, the loss in income of the over-30-months scheme of £29 million, the extra expense of £19 million on the cattle passport scheme and the lack of full compensation for the reduced HLCAs of £35 million, he is taking £127 million from the sectors that he claims to be helping? In addition, does he not acknowledge that, during his stewardship of the Ministry, he has had to announce a £1.8 billion fall in receipts to farmers because of the drop in prices? Has he not tried to put before the House a travesty of the true position? Does he agree that the package he has just announced is providing no help to any sector of British agriculture other than sheep and cattle?

Does the Minister accept that many farmers heeded his words in good faith when he said that they should come to the House and lobby in a democratic fashion to put their views? Does he not realise that their hopes were raised as a result of that exercise and that now there will be despair tonight in the farmhouses and the countryside at his announcement? Does that not show that the Government care little for rural Britain?

I now turn to the inquiry that the Minister has announced today. Let me say on behalf of the Opposition that, if it helps to find better ways to protect the public health, we welcome it. Of course we will give the inquiry every assistance. Does the Minister acknowledge, however, that policy to date has been founded on the best scientific advice available, and that £56 million has already been spent on research?

When did the Minister last meet Lord Justice Phillips to discuss the way in which the inquiry will operate? In the light of his almost unbelievable statement that the Government are not out to make political capital out of the matter—he must think that we were born yesterday—will he place in the House of Commons the details of the instructions to Lord Justice Phillips as to the way in which the inquiry is to be conducted?

In his statement, the Minister talked about assessors. Can he tell us who those assessors are? How will they be chosen? Does he accept that the people who may have to provide scientific back-up to the inquiry are the current experts in setting policy in BSE? How much will the inquiry cost? Will the Minister assure me that he will provide the necessary practical, scientific, secretarial and financial back-up and support to those past Ministers, officials and others who may be called to give evidence to the inquiry, so that their evidence can be properly given? Will he tell us exactly who in Whitehall will have sight of the documents if it will not be Ministers?

Is not the real reason for the statement the fact that it will provide a public smokescreen for the Minister's failures to help British agriculture? Does the Minister not realise that he has given an open goal to those in Europe who do not want the beef ban lifted? Does he not realise that they will say to him, "If you are so concerned about the handling of the BSE inquiry that you now need a separate inquiry on the matter, we had better wait until the results of that are known before we even consider raising the ban"? He has failed to convince the European standing veterinary committee to impose the specified risk materials ban. His statement is an open goal and a gift to those who would keep the beef ban in place.

Does the Minister realise that the inquiry has been proposed to act as a smokescreen for his inability to enforce the ban on meat coming into this country without SRMs being removed and his total inability to impose his ban on beef on the bone? Does he not realise that the statement and inquiry will give the British beef industry—an industry weakened by his Government's actions—up to two years of uncertainty, and will do nothing to reinforce the messages of confidence that he has been trying to put out about the safety of British beef?

This is a miserable little statement. It has been by a Minister who is exhibiting Scrooge-like tendencies towards British agriculture. It will do nothing to enhance the safety of British beef. Farmers will see it for what it is. He has lost out to the Treasury and failed British agriculture.

Dr. Cunningham: At the end of that long, convoluted series of questions, it is difficult to know exactly what the right hon. Gentleman's position is either on public expenditure or the future of the beef industry—or, indeed, the inquiry itself. He seemed to want it both ways. He is, after all, a right hon. Member who was both a Minister in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and a Treasury Minister when the events were unfolding.

On the right hon. Member's first comment about the crisis in the British beef industry, we all know very well the origins of that crisis. We all know who was in charge in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when the crisis developed. It is manifestly absurd to suggest that the problems faced by our beef farmers have all occurred in the past seven months.

As for the right hon. Gentleman's disdainful reference to £85 million-worth of additional expenditure and support for farmers, we shall see whether the farming industry and the rural communities share his view. I will tell him something. How can those former occupants of the Treasury Bench be so disdainful about public expenditure when, with this additional money, we shall be spending on one sector and one product—beef—between £1.4 billion and £1.5 billion in the current financial year? That is a measure of the support for the beef industry.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to my failure—I think he said that is what it was—to take action to prevent beef coming into the country that had not had SRMs removed. That decision will take effect from 1 January. It has been widely welcomed by farmers and Farmers Weekly, whose leader column said:

"Dr. Cunningham deserves our support for defending the best interests of UK consumers and farmers."

On the position of the right hon. Gentleman and, for that matter, the shadow Cabinet on the decision on selling beef on the bone, is he aware that his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), a Minister of Agriculture in the Conservative Government, said on the radio that, if he had had the same advice as me, he would have taken the same decision? Is the right hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) aware that his right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), another member of the shadow Cabinet, said something similar?

What does the right hon. Member for Fylde think about the MAFF press release which says:

"SEAC and the Chief Medical Officer have said that any risk is minuscule. The Government's policy of extreme caution in relation to BSE requires us to ensure that the tissues in which infectivity might potentially occur are removed from the human and animal food chain"?

That is a MAFF press release, put out by his right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), the shadow Leader of the House—another member of the shadow Cabinet—when she was Minister of Agriculture. Who is speaking for the Opposition on safety in food? I take it that, in spite of the chief medical officer's comments that no one should knowingly allow infectivity involving BSE into the human food chain, the right hon. Member for Fylde begs to know better. That is his apparent position.

The right hon. Member dismissed a reference to the possibility of an early retirement scheme for farmers. Why he did that, I do not know. I can tell him that there are plenty of people—and organisations—in agriculture who are interested in sitting down to discuss it with us. That is another thing about which he and his colleagues did absolutely nothing during 18 years of government.

The right hon. Member began by saying that he would support the inquiry into BSE and new-variant CJD, and then went on to disparage it at length, saying that, among other things, it would deter people in Europe from lifting the beef ban. He has not a shred of evidence for saying that, of course—not a scintilla. We have made much more progress in dealing with our colleagues in Europe than he and his colleagues ever did, and we shall continue to do so.

As for the right hon. Member's remarks about political bias, does he really expect us to believe that Lord Justice Phillips would accept the appointment of conducting this important inquiry in the public interest on anything other than totally independent grounds?

Mr. Jack: Give us some details.

Dr. Cunningham: I have given more details this afternoon in a written answer. I have given the terms of reference in my statement. There will be two special assessors—one for scientific matters and one for administration. We shall discuss their appointment with Lord Justice Phillips before announcing their names. The reality is that, if the Opposition had nothing to hide, they would welcome an inquiry into the issues, as I believe the public will.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): Will the Minister acknowledge—given the financial context of his statement and the fact that the Liberal Democrats have been critical of the Labour party before, during and since the election for its unwillingness to break the Conservative constraints set by the previous Chancellor of the Exchequer—that the farming industry will be totally bemused to hear the Conservatives, of all people, complaining that their constraints have been broken? After all, the Conservatives have previously demanded that those constraints be broken in the context of supporting the beef industry.

Taken together with the fact that the Conservative Front-Bench spokesman spent longer talking about the inquiry than he did about the details of the package, the Conservatives' reaction tells us all we need to know about their credibility and priorities. That is the parliamentary and political point.

Will the Minister also acknowledge that some decisions relevant to the beef sector of the industry are entirely the remit of his Administration, not least the changes to the over-30-months scheme and the additional costs that will be imposed next year by passports and the like? Given the total package, in the context of green pound revaluation and the horrendous difficulties that the strength of sterling is causing, large sections of the agricultural community will reach the political and practical conclusion that—try though he has—his proposals will be too little, too late for many of our hill farmers and rural communities.

On the question of the Commission and the second part of the Minister's statement, I seek further reassurance about the political attitudes at Brussels level. Some people at that level will take any opportunity they can to hold back further progress in the lifting of the beef ban. Has the Minister discussed with the Commission the terms or the timetable of the committee of inquiry in advance of his statement today? Without doubt, some of our past problems with Brussels have been because announcements have been made here, and the first that the Commission has heard of them was over the news tapes and not directly from Ministers.

I make a final general plea to the Minister. Will he recognise that we cannot restructure in isolation or without due regard to the longer-term aims of Agenda 2000 and the reform of the common agricultural policy? He has rightly identified the need for greater emphasis on conservation and countryside management generally. Will he also recognise that the most fundamental requirement to make that a reality is the people of the countryside? If the net effect of the statement is that more of the sons and daughters of smaller-scale, less well-heeled family farmers do not anticipate being able to follow their fathers, grandfathers and great-grandfathers in the rural communities that they have served so well, that will negate and make impossible the very priority that the Minister and the EU Commissioner have set out for CAP reform. The crisis of morale will remain, despite the statement, and we will have to return to some of those issues, as a matter of urgency, in the new year.

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for a more measured and more informed contribution than that from the right hon. Member for Fylde. The hon. Gentleman pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman spent longer trying to damn the inquiry than referring to the situation of the beef industry; that proves that he did not have a lot to say.

I am aware that costs that will be introduced at the beginning of the next financial year will have a significant impact on the industry, but we must face the reality that we cannot go on simply using more and more taxpayers' money in the way that we have done. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the reluctance of some young people to follow their parents into farming. I see that among hill farmers in my constituency.

It is principally because—as has been evidenced in the 28 years that I have represented them—their position in the farming income league table has not changed. Hill farmers were at the bottom of the league when I was elected to the House almost 28 years ago, and they are still there. The inescapable conclusion is that the policies that have been followed have not made it easier, more profitable or more economically advantageous to pursue hill farming. That is why young people choose other and better careers for themselves.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned agri-monetary compensation. If I had taken advantage of the total agri-monetary compensation available to the Government for the beef sector, it would have amounted to £77 million. The package that I have announced exceeds that figure, as the hon. Gentleman knows. He said that the package is too little, too late. Time will be the judge of that. My guess is that most reasonable people in agriculture will welcome the statement as representing significant help for them.

As for the hon. Gentleman's question about the views of Brussels, I share his concern that the political attitudes of some people—and not veterinary or medical science, or the manifest safety of British beef—have led to the decisions that have been made. As I have said many times, that is unacceptable to the Government, and it was for that reason, among others, that I made it clear to my colleagues last week that I was not prepared to delay any further the introduction of the specified risk materials controls on imports of beef to this country. For those reasons, and because of our consistent pressure, I hope and expect that the Commission will produce a proposal in January, to be considered in Brussels, for the partial lifting of the ban.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South): Will my right hon. Friend agree that farmers in less-favoured areas, especially in Wales, will be helped greatly by his announcement? Will he also confirm that he will press his European partners to ensure that the ban on British beef will be lifted in the near future, because that is the real answer for our farming industry in the long term?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is absurd for the Conservative party to pretend that giving an industrial sector such as the beef sector another £85 million will somehow damage its interests or will not be generally welcomed by people in the industry. [Interruption.] We hear it again: too little, too late. We are proposing to give the beef industry more money in this financial year than the previous Conservative Government did. [Interruption.] The right hon. Member for Fylde says from a sedentary position, "Less than you have taken away." That is also wrong, because most of the announcements that we have made will not take effect until the beginning of the next financial year. I can promise my hon. Friend's constituents, and farmers generally, that we shall continue to work assiduously and constructively with our European colleagues for a lifting of the ban.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): May I welcome the Minister's statement in relation to the BSE inquiry, but seek his reassurance that the inquiry will not be a further obstacle to the lifting of the beef ban during the deliberations that take place over the next 12 months?

Secondly, the Minister has made clear the Government's commitment to some form of decommissioning scheme and restructuring within the beef sector. The details he has given so far have a rather indiscriminate feel about them. What reassurance can he give to quality sectors of the market—such as the Scottish quality beef herds—that they will be protected from an indiscriminate cut in production?

Finally, does the right hon. Gentleman understand that there are declining incomes and revenues in almost all sectors of the farming industry, and that the assistance is targeted at a proportion of the industry? There will still be enormous unease in areas of the farming industry where incomes have substantially fallen in recent months and years, as there is nothing on offer in the package today.

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his supportive comments about the decision to institute a public inquiry, and I am sure that that decision will be widely welcomed.

I emphasise that we want to have a dialogue with the industry about an early retirement scheme, which will be voluntary—after all, we cannot make it compulsory. Britain has never taken advantage of the European Union availability of early retirement schemes. Ten of our partner countries have such schemes; we and four others do not. Rather like their failure to make an early start on the decommissioning of fishing vessels—which they should have done, and could have done, but failed to do—the previous Administration failed to take any action on providing an early retirement scheme for farmers. I want to have a dialogue about that with farmers. If we can agree the general outline of a scheme and have it approved by Brussels, it will be available—but, I emphasise, on a voluntary basis.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about other sectors of the farming industry. We have said from the outset that we recognised that the problems were most severe in the beef sector and that if we were to produce additional resources, we would target them at that sector. That is what we have done.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): Is the Minister aware that the families of those people—young people, in the main—who died from the new-variant CJD will be pleased with the announcement of the inquiry today? When I see Opposition Members laughing at that announcement—I have a constituent who died from CJD—I think that they have their priorities wrong. The inquiry will be public, and we need to get to the truth. Will the inquiry have the power to subpoena witnesses?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I hope that his prediction is right, and that the families—and people well beyond the families—who have lost loved ones as a result of a cruel degenerative disease for which there is no cure will welcome the decision.

The answer to my hon. Friend's question on the subpoenaing of witnesses is no. This will be a non-statutory inquiry, rather similar to the Scott inquiry in that regard. As then, the Government will watch the proceedings carefully. We will take advice from Lord Justice Phillips, and if he believes that some extra powers are needed, we will be ready to consider them.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): On the question of the inquiry, does the Minister accept that I and those of my colleagues who had ministerial responsibility look forward to the report of the inquiry, believing as we do that—at least for the most part—all the necessary decisions were fully and promptly taken? Does he further accept the real anxiety that the mere fact of holding the inquiry will make the lifting of the ban more difficult to obtain?

On the question of compensation, does the right hon. Gentleman understand the anxiety in the farming industry as to the modesty of this package? Will he accept that there will be considerable concern at what he has said about restructuring, which, in effect, amounts to a reduction in UK production capacity which is not matched by a reduction in capacities in the EU? Does he also accept that there will be concern that he has not done the things that lay particularly within his competence—to reduce, at least in part, the charges he has imposed, and to lift the weight cap on the over-30-months scheme?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his comments about the inquiry. He referred to the modesty of the package. We live in strange times when £85 million of additional taxpayers' money is described as modest. His comment reflects on the colossal sums and the scale of the finance currently going into the beef sector. Set beside the £1.4 billion provided for the beef sector, most people would say that £85 million was modest. However, set beside the calls on the Government's public expenditure and the need for constraint—and compared with the level of support given to other industrial sectors—£85 million remains a substantial sum. People outside will be astonished to hear the Conservative party saying that it thinks that £85 million of their money can be produced just like that and dismissed as not sufficient, as he and his right hon. and hon. Friends have dismissed it.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked about restructuring. It is not the Government's position that we want to see the restructuring of only the UK beef sector. We have made it clear consistently that we want an urgent restructuring of the beef sector in Europe as a whole. One consequence of the ban is that Britain is taking far more of its share of the burden of beef; the over-30-months scheme and the calf processing scheme are clear examples of that. We want to see the beef sector in Europe as a whole restructured. I thought that the Conservative party supported the proposals for reform in Agenda 2000. I thought that that was Tory party policy; it is certainly the policy of the National Farmers Union.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries): I thank my right hon. Friend for his statement, which will be welcomed in many rural communities, not only because of the additional finance for the industry but because of the establishment of the inquiry.

Earlier today in my constituency, a local meat packing company—Lockerbie Meat Packers—announced that it was to go into receivership with the immediate loss of some 71 jobs, with another 24 jobs in jeopardy. I sincerely hope that it is my right hon. Friend's long-term aim to remove the ban on beef exports. It is somewhat ironic that, only last month, this Government sat with other EU states at a summit to discuss the importance of jobs within the EU. I hope that my right hon. Friend will push as hard as possible to ensure that the ban is lifted.

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is right to draw attention to the continuing consequences of the ban on the exports of British beef. Sadly, he has experienced some of those consequences in his constituency, and I very much share his sorrow that people are losing their jobs. That is exactly why it is important for us to have constructive and open dialogue with our European colleagues about the nature of our rigorous approach to safeguarding British beef and the strength of our case for lifting the ban. If our European colleagues and partners had any idea that we were withholding information, that would be far more likely to prevent us from getting the ban lifted than our open and constructive attitude to all the issues.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): Does the Minister understand the sheer despair of farmers at the frozen immobility of the Government in the past two months, which has made the incomes crisis worse? Does he realise that he already has an early redundancy scheme—it is known as bankruptcy? Does he acknowledge the sheer haemorrhage of farmers of all sorts off the land, particularly in areas such as his constituency and mine where they are essential to its upkeep? When he next talks about environmental improvements and the role of the environment, will he add that farmers are necessary for the environment?

Dr. Cunningham: I am not sure what the right hon. Gentleman's question was—if, indeed, he asked one at all. Yes, I understand what is going on in those areas, as he does, because we represent similar constituencies and he spoke at the Dispatch Box as an Agriculture Minister, with some success.

I do not dispute it when the right hon. Gentleman says that there is a crisis, but I dispute the fact that the crisis has arisen only since 1 May. Being a reasonable man, he must know that the problems, particularly those faced by beef farmers, are very long-standing and deep-seated. The crisis has been gathering momentum for some years. Sadly, the end of it is not in sight. That is the reality of where we are, and I can tell the right hon. Gentleman and his right hon. Friends, as well as the farmers, that the way out of the crisis is not simply by throwing more and more public money at it. There have to be better ways than that.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): In welcoming my right hon. Friend's statement and the two aspects that he has dwelt on, may I ask for an assurance? One thing that all farmers are asking for from 1 January is effective labelling of all foreign imports and, more particularly, some dealings not merely with supermarkets, which we understand have their own difficulties but are coming into order, but with the catering industry, so that it plays fair and there is a level playing field.

Dr. Cunningham: My hon. Friend the Minister of State and I continue to work for the level playing field that my hon. Friend asks for on behalf of farmers. I know that they want that, and that is the reason for the implementation of the specified risk materials decision from 1 January. That is also why the previous Administration rightly took action to ban imports of over-30-months beef. Farmers keep telling us that they believe that over-30-months beef is coming into Britain, but we have no evidence of that. If they have tangible evidence, we will immediately take action to prosecute the people involved. As for a beef labelling scheme, we expect to have such a scheme in place by the spring of next year.

Finally, next year we will also be publishing for the first time the hygiene assessment scores of abattoirs and meat cutting plants so that everyone—consumers, butchers and wholesalers—will know exactly the quality of hygiene provision in our plants. That, too, should give British beef a positive boost.

I emphasise that British beef is the safest beef produced anywhere in Europe. We continue to take action to ensure that that is so, and I would encourage anyone who buys beef, either as an individual consumer or an organisation, to try wherever and whenever possible to buy British beef.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): May I seek clarification from the Minister on one point? In an earlier answer, he said that about £77 million was available for the beef sector in agri-monetary compensation. In evidence to the Select Committee on Agriculture, he said that £980 million was available in total across all four agricultural sectors for compensation. Can he say how that breaks down among the four sectors?

Why did the Minister's list of objectives for the reform of the common agricultural policy omit any reference to creating a competitive UK agriculture industry? Does he understand that that fuels suspicions among the farming community that he is happy to see a disproportionate amount of the burden from restructuring falling on the British beef producer rather than throughout Europe as a whole?

Finally, what assurances has the right hon. Gentleman sought from the European Commission and from other member states that they will not use the inquiry as an excuse to delay any aspect of the lifting of the beef export ban?

Dr. Cunningham: There is no answer to the final question because, as the hon. Gentleman knows and as I said earlier, I suspect that some people are more motivated by political or economic considerations than by considerations of human health or veterinary science. We continue to resist that approach wherever and whenever possible.

The hon. Gentleman began by asking me about the total available for agri-monetary compensation. He is right. The total is £980 million. Of course, that would be spread over three years, and up to half of it would have to come from the United Kingdom alone, but 50 per cent. could qualify for some EU support. Within that total and those restrictions, the total available at present in support for the beef sector is £77 million. I should be happy to come back to his Select Committee to go into that in greater detail, as I understand that it is to investigate the matter.

I said in my statement—the right hon. Member for Fylde questioned this—that we had to have economically as well as environmentally sustainable agriculture. That is one of our objectives, again not merely for the United Kingdom but for reform of the CAP. Those words were contained in the final declaration from the Council of Agriculture Ministers which went to the European summit in Luxembourg. Now we are awaiting specific, detailed proposals to give effect to the legislative changes that we anticipate from Commissioner Fischler in the beef sector, in the dairy sector—I still hope—and in the cereals sector, too.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Order. The statement has been running for nearly an hour and there are many hon. Members on their feet. I shall let it run for a little longer, but I appeal to hon. Members for brisk questions, and I think that the Minister will oblige with brisk answers. We must get through as quickly as possible.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): In the absence of a Welsh Office statement—I understand the reason for that—may I ask my right hon. Friend about the implications for my constituency, our beef farmers and the amounts of money involved?

I welcome my right hon. Friend's decision to have a public inquiry. May I tell him about Miss Vicky Rimmer, a young woman who fell victim to a CJD or CJD-type disease, and who died only last month? Her family will welcome his decision to have an inquiry.

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support for the decision to hold an inquiry. I was making the statement on behalf of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland. I think—I am speaking from memory here—that Wales will benefit by about 25 per cent. of the hill livestock compensatory allowance and about 10 per cent. of the agri-monetary compensation; Welsh farmers will benefit considerably from the statement.

Mr. Tom King (Bridgwater): The Minister said that everyone knew the cause of BSE. Will he confirm that he will not rule out Lord Justice Phillips's investigation into alternative possible causes that might be advanced? Does he recognise that the test of his statement will be whether it gives confidence again to the industry, which is facing a very serious crisis? He rightly said that he is not responsible for many of the background problems that affect the beef industry, but what is different under his Administration is the continuing and sustained level of the pound. There have been five increases in interest rates in the past six months and there are reports that because of increasing wage rates there is likely to be a further increase in interest rates. Does he recognise that that is a particularly grave problem at present and that it is affecting all markets? Against that background, does he recognise that, sadly, it does not look as though his statement will give the confidence that is needed?

Dr. Cunningham: I disagree with the right hon. Gentleman. I did not say that we knew the cause of BSE; I said that we knew that there was a direct link between BSE and the new variant of CJD. There is scientific evidence for that. Of course it will be for Lord Justice Phillips to decide who should give evidence and the way in which it should be taken. That procedure is entirely a matter for him, and neither I nor any of my ministerial colleagues will intervene in that in any way, as I made clear in my statement and I am happy to make clear again to the right hon. Gentleman and the House.

I accept the point about the test of time being what happens in the market. This morning, I was unhappy to learn when listening to "Farming Today", as no doubt were many right hon. and hon. Members, of the collapse in lamb prices, for example, and of the reality that we are producing more lamb than the market can take. I listened with care to Robert Forster giving the reasons. It is about consumer choice, not only here but abroad. That is another important factor.

Questions about the strength of sterling and interest rate policy are more properly addressed to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): Will the inquiry consider the work of Harash Narang, who was developing a live test for BSE when the resources were taken away by the previous Government? If that research had been successful, it could have saved the country millions, indeed billions, of pounds.

Dr. Cunningham: I have been in correspondence with Dr. Narang, and the Ministry is co-operating with him in a collaborative venture. I can respond as I did to the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King): if Dr. Narang wants to give evidence to the inquiry, he should approach Lord Justice Phillips in the normal way. The address of the inquiry secretariat is published in the written answer that I have given today.

Mr. William Thompson (West Tyrone): I welcome the crumbs that have fallen to the farmers from the Exchequer's table, but does the Minister recognise that a section of the farming industry, the beef finishers, will not be directly affected by the money? They are the most severely affected people; does he intend to let them go to the wall? What effect will the package have in Northern Ireland?

Dr. Cunningham: Beef finishers should be among the people who benefit from the low cost of cattle in the market. We have directed this assistance—the hon. Gentleman called it crumbs, but he may wish to reconsider, as £85 million is hardly crumbs—to the primary beef producers, and it will benefit them significantly.

Farmers in Northern Ireland will benefit, although I am sorry that I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman by exactly how much; perhaps I can drop him a note about that.

Mr. Nick Ainger (West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and particularly the way in which he has managed to target the help towards those sectors that need it most. Will he confirm that farmers in Wales will receive approximately £12 million as a result of his announcement? When can farmers expect to receive that additional help? As he knows, they face very severe financial circumstances. Does he intend to enforce rigorously the controls on imported EU beef and to ensure that they are applied not only at the ports but at the packing plants where much of the processing is done?

Dr. Cunningham: I think that my hon. Friend is right, and that farmers in Wales will benefit by about £12 million. That is based on calculations on the back of an envelope, and I hope that no one will nail my hide to the wall on the figure if it is slightly out. No doubt hon. Members think that they have better reasons for doing that in any case.

When will the money be paid? As soon as is administratively possible, consistent with getting my decision approved by the Commission in Brussels. My hon. Friend asked whether we would be rigorous about enforcing the controls; the answer is yes. Indeed, we now insist that the controls be exercised before any meat arrives in the UK in the first place.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): Has the Minister had an opportunity to consider the longer-term effect on those who look after livestock on the uplands and in the less-favoured areas? He has announced £25 million for them today, but he will know that, if they go out of business or take early retirement, that will have a considerable effect on both the rural economy and the local environment in sparsely populated areas. It is only the keeping of livestock and the careful grazing of them on the uplands that maintains the British countryside in its present state. If he has not done that exercise, will he do so urgently?

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Lady makes an important point, and we have indeed considered that. She is right to say that hill livestock compensatory allowances are targeted particularly on those in the less-favoured areas. It is also important to recognise that the total of £60 million in agri-monetary compensation is targeted at suckler herds, so some will go to people farming in the upland areas.

Mr. Hugh Bayley (City of York): I have in my hand an article from March 1989—nearly nine years ago—in which I warned of the danger of the infective agent jumping species from cattle to humans; at that time, the Conservative party accused me of scaremongering. Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the factors that contributed to the lack of trust in British beef in Europe was the previous Government's lack of candour and openness, and that the decision to hold an open inquiry will help to rebuild the confidence in British beef that we all want?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The important thing in all such matters is to be absolutely candid and transparent about the problems that we face and how we are to resolve them. The Government are determined to eradicate BSE completely from the national herd. The House, and the United Kingdom as a whole, have nothing to fear from an inquiry into these events in the terms in which we have set it up. We are more open and more candid about these matters than anyone else; it is important that we should remain so, because that is the basis of the strength of our case.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Given that the Minister has decided to channel this wholly inadequate help to the beleaguered beef farmers through the medium of the HLCAs and the suckler cow premium scheme, can he assure the House that the premium will now be brought up to the maximum permitted by the European Union; and if not, why not?

Dr. Cunningham: That is just a simple demand for more money, and it comes ill from the hon. Gentleman, who, when he was on the Government Benches, used always to be critical of public expenditure.

Mr. David Hanson (Delyn): May I thank my right hon. Friend for his statement; for the extra money that is now due to Wales; and for his action since 1 January on a level playing field and on labelling? Can he assure us that the inquiry into the BSE crisis will include an inquiry into the payments made to date to farmers, because there is grave concern in my constituency that much of the money that has been put into the industry has found its way not into farmers' pockets but into those of middlemen?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, but I think that the final part of his question goes beyond the terms of reference of the inquiry to be held by Lord Justice Phillips.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): Does the Minister not accept that the £25 million that he has announced in HLCA additions would have had more impact if he had announced it to the House two months ago, in the normal course of events, and if the Government had not decided not to pay the £60 million suckler cow addition that the previous Government paid at this time last year? Because of the procrastination, with the Minister going round cap in hand to the Treasury, confidence has been eroded. It is all very well for him to say that he wants to support the British beef industry, but his decision to wind down the industry has caused more and more British beef farmers to go out of production. We will have a smaller effort in beef, and more will be imported.

Dr. Cunningham: I accept none of that. The hon. Gentleman well knows that his party, when in government, made no provision whatever for the continuation the following year of the special one-off payment of £60 million. The fact is that I am providing £85 million; in case he cannot work it out, that is £25 million more.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Has not BSE been our most poisonous inheritance from the Conservative Government? I return to a point made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) about those who attend at the non-statutory inquiry presided over by Lord Justice Phillips. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that there will be no impediment to civil servants attending? He mentioned former Prime Ministers. Is it simply a matter of courtesy to ask them to open up the papers relating to their Administrations, or do the Government need their permission to gain full access to all official papers?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments and I am happy to tell him that we will place no impediment in the path of anyone. Civil servants from all Departments will co-operate fully with the inquiry. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has written, as a matter of courtesy, to former Prime Ministers in the period concerned. Papers will be available. Current Ministers will have no involvement in the preparation or provision of those papers, or in giving evidence at the inquiry.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): Liberal Democrat Members warmly welcome the judicial inquiry, having pressed for it for 12 months without reaction from the previous Government. Does not the inquiry have two purposes? First, it must learn from mistakes so that we can avoid repetition of what the Minister correctly described as total disaster. Is it not ironic that local government councillors and officers who make drastic mistakes can be surcharged but Ministers escape scot free? Is not the second purpose to ensure that everyone in this country, in Brussels and on the continent knows that there will be no further cover-up, and that we can be assured that British beef, in the Minister's words, is truly not only the safest in the world but demonstrably the safest?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his measured and constructive response. Yes, the principal purpose is to learn from the mistakes that were made—probably genuinely. We must learn the lessons of what has been a human tragedy and a financial disaster. It has been a disaster for everyone associated with our beef industry.

On personal surcharge, the proper view—I had better say that it is my personal view—is that it is inappropriate for people in elected office at any level to be liable to personal surcharge. I have always thought that; I am on the record on that. The people in current difficulties must face the consequences of the law the way it is.

It is important that it is demonstrable beyond any doubt that we have disclosed everything and have not been involved in the withholding of any advice, information or scientific knowledge about how these disastrous events developed. I believe that an inquiry is a further clear demonstration of our commitment to that approach.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): May I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement on the inquiry into BSE and the support for the suckler cow sector, which will benefit farmers in my constituency? Frustration will continue among those farmers when they see imported beef from countries such as Namibia and Botswana being sold in British supermarkets under misleading labels. If it is possible for consumers to know the country of origin of every bottle of wine that they buy, could they not know the country of origin of every joint of meat?

Dr. Cunningham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his welcome for my statement, respect both in of the inquiry and of the considerable support for beef farmers. We will introduce a beef labelling scheme from spring next year. While we cannot discriminate against lawful trade—I emphasise that we have legal obligations—it is nevertheless my experience that consumers want to know more and more about the provenance of the food they buy, whether it is animal or vegetable products. We are pressing ahead on that basis. We will encourage supermarkets and food chains to do the same, so that people have all the knowledge that they need about the origin of the food and food products that they buy.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): Does the right hon. Gentleman understand the tragedy of the west country in the figures published by Exeter university on the reduction of income—a fall of 85 per cent. for lowland livestock and of 59 per cent. for specialist areas? It goes on with every sector. Does he understand the feeling in the west country that the ban on beef on the bone is a coup de grace? His medical advisers stated that there was a million to one chance of infection. With that information, why cannot the consumer choose whether he wants his Sunday joint to be on the bone or not? Why should we nanny the consumer? We do not do it with cigarette smoking; why should we do it with beef?

Dr. Cunningham: I try very hard to understand the problems faced by beef producers. We shall go on doing so. The actions that I have described today and others that I have taken are all aimed at helping our beef industry. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food published its own agreed analysis of farm incomes on 1 December. The right hon. Gentleman can examine a copy in the Library. I think that the figures are different from the Exeter university ones, which I have not seen. They show very serious falls in income. There is no dispute on that general point.

As for what the right hon. Gentleman said about taking beef off the bone, my wife did a little research with our family butcher this week. He said that he sold six or seven T-bones a week. We are talking about 5 per cent. of beef; 95 per cent. is already sold off the bone. Nothing in what I have decided is going to harm anyone. Let me remind him of the views of the chief medical officer and of the shadow Leader of the House when she was Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The CMO serves me, as well as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, and said:

"It would be matter of grave concern if any tissues that have been shown to transmit BSE were knowingly allowed to remain in the human food chain. This is a real risk, not a theoretical risk."

In June 1994, the right hon. Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard) said that she had to act with

"extreme caution in relation to BSE . . . to ensure that the tissues in which infectivity might potentially occur are removed from the human . . . food chain."—[Official Report, 30 June 1994; Vol. 245, c. 654.]

That was the position of the Government supported by the right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery). Our position is the same.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): Will the Minister note that in many European countries, the early retirement scheme is linked to a scheme for encouraging young entrants to the industry so that it becomes not only a restructuring but a revitalising process? If he would consider that, I think that there would be some appreciation of the scheme's introduction.

The Minister has made a great deal of environmental sustainability, but is not the production of beef from grass a model of environmental sustainability compared with the intensive production systems that bring us our poultry meat and much of our pig meat? Is it not time to consider the whole meat sector?

I welcome the Minister's remarks on imports, but would it not be appropriate for the Government to institute a comprehensive investigation—an inquiry, indeed—into imports so that people's minds can be put to rest and they can really understand what is going on and what might be done about it?

Dr. Cunningham: I repeat that the proposal on the early retirement scheme is for discussion; it has not been decided yet. We must try to agree a scheme, first, with farmers and their representatives and, then, with the Commission in Brussels. I am willing to listen to all the arguments about what should be in such a scheme.

I certainly agree with the hon. Gentleman about the extensive production of beef and low-input farming, to which I referred in my statement.

As for imports, I believe that we now have the strongest checks and safeguards on imports of beef of any European country. There is always room for improvement, and if I can see practical ways in which to introduce better safeguards, I will consider them. As I have already said, however, it was the previous Administration who made it illegal to import over-30-months beef into Britain. We have built on that approach, and we are now looking at stringent safeguards on all beef imported into this country. If there are others things that we can do which would not fall foul of our obligations in the European Union, I would be willing to consider them.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): In the first half of the Minister's statement, he described the plight of British farmers, and his solution was partly to allow for the structural reform of the industry so that more and more farmers will disappear. He then went on to describe the inquiry process and linked that section of his statement with his comments on structural reform by saying that the inquiry is "even more serious" than that reform. Would he not agree that there is nothing more serious than the plight of British farmers at the moment? The British farmer has always provided the backbone of British society, but the Government are setting out to remove it.

Dr. Cunningham: On reflection, the hon. Gentleman may regret that intervention. I said that that inquiry is more serious because CJD has cost the lives of more than 20 young people.

Mr. Gray: Twenty-five farmers have committed suicide.

Dr. Cunningham: The hon. Gentleman is not doing his own or his party's case any good by persisting with that. Many more people may die as a consequences of that awful disease, and we need to treat that threat extremely seriously. That is what the Government are doing. I am sorry that we cannot carry the hon. Gentleman and his party with us.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): Can the Phillips inquiry be prevailed on to find out why the previous Government refused for four consecutive years to invest in a cattle identification scheme—an animal tracking centre—which was critical in the Florence agreement and is one of the principal measures that would ensure the lifting of the beef ban?

Dr. Cunningham: I emphasise that the inquiry to be conducted by Lord Justice Phillips will be politically impartial. The nature of the proceedings will be determined by him. As for my hon. Friend's comments about a cattle traceability scheme, in that and other regards I agree that the previous Administration's approach was woefully inadequate and slow, as was their approach to the selective cull. I am pleased to say that the cattle traceability scheme will be located in my hon. Friend's constituency of Workington. It will create more than 260 jobs and it will be operational in the early part of next year.

In respect of the selective cull, when we took over, the previous Administration had identified and culled 2,000 cattle. In the seven months that we have been in government, we have increased that total to more than 50,000. That represents the difference in approach.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet): Last week, I tabled a priority written question asking how much the United Kingdom had saved since the Fontainebleau agreement in payments to the European Union. As is the custom with the Government, that priority question has not been answered, but I understand that the figure is about £21.5 billion. That money was saved, at least in part, at the expense of the farmers' insurance policy under the agri-monetary compensation scheme. Instead of giving farmers 10 per cent. of what is, in fact, their own money, why does the Minister not give them what they need—5 per cent. of what we have saved?

Dr. Cunningham: That is just another plea for more and more public expenditure, with no account taken of how that money would be provided. What the hon. Gentleman says is patently absurd.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Can the Minister assure the House that the £85 million to which he has referred is entirely additional to his Department's existing public expenditure survey line and that there will be no parallel reductions in his PES line elsewhere either in this year or in future years?

Dr. Cunningham: This is additional funding.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): Given the catastrophic fall in farm incomes, which the Minister has accepted, and the fact that, as the Minister would agree, most farmers are concerned not so much with global amounts as with how much is available to them at their farm gate to get them through the next year, has he conducted any research on how much money, on average, will be available to individual lowland beef farmers, given that most of his support will go to hill farmers?

[Mr. Edward Leigh]

If the right hon. Gentleman is unable to answer that question today, will he accept that many might well come to conclusion that the sum for each individual farm will be very modest indeed?

Dr. Cunningham: Speaking from memory, I think that the answer is about 30 per cent. The hon. Gentleman must bear in mind the fact that a significant proportion of the aid will go to those with suckler herds in the lowlands as well as in less-favoured areas.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): Is the Minister able to understand why my farmers in Ribble Valley will be very angry at his statement? In one part of that statement, he said that farmers will get a one-off payment of £85 million, but, next year, they will face lifetime extra costs that will exceed that amount. Does he understand that, next year, they will face increased costs for which that money will not compensate? Does he appreciate that all the farming industry has been hit sideways, including the ancillary industries that rely on farming? The rural economy has had the wind knocked out of its sails because of his announcement today. The bleak prospect in 1998 is of many farmers going out of business involuntarily because the banks will call in their loans.

Dr. Cunningham: I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman apparently takes no account of the fact that the problems with the rural communities and the rural economy, as well with agriculture, are in large measure due to the 18 years of Conservative rule. That was made manifest by the electors on 1 May when they drove out Conservative Members of Parliament from so many rural areas because they believed that those Members' policies had failed them.

What I understand about beef, agriculture or any industry in the United Kingdom economy is that, if it can be sustained only by more and more subsidy, it has no long-term prospect of viability. That is not the way forward.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): Will the Minister share with me the disappointment of my constituency farmers, especially beef farmers in the south-eastern quarter of Leicestershire, that, although until now he had done nothing to apply to Europe for agri-monetary compensation—today we have been offered just a small proportion of the total available—up until now our farmers have had to pay through their own taxation for the agri-monetary compensation paid to the farmers of other European Union countries? Can the right hon. Gentleman tell us why he has applied for such a little amount on this occasion?

Dr. Cunningham: Yes. I have already said that a total of £77 million was available for the beef sector. I am applying for £60 million of it, added to which will be £25 million of hill livestock compensatory allowances. The hon. and learned Gentleman asked why we, as taxpayers, contribute to the funding of the European Union. The answer is that we are members of it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Speaker: Thank you. That is the end of the statement. We must get back to the main business. I call—

Mr. Evans: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I have already made my views known about the enormous cost of calling Parliament—

Madam Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman asked a lengthy question on the statement and I hope that he is not trying to extend the time given to it. It went on for an hour and a half and many of his colleagues have been disappointed because I was unable to call them. I hope that his point of order is one with which I can deal.

Mr. Evans: Yes. I hope so. The House of Commons is sitting for one day this week, obviously at an enormous cost—perhaps £50,000 in Members' travelling expenses for calling them back. A large amount of fresh food has been brought into the House today which may not be put to use in the next two weeks. Will you use your good guidance to ensure that no food is thrown away and that any left over is given to hostels for the homeless or other people?

Madam Speaker: That was barely a point of order for me. We have a superb organisation in the House, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that it has not brought in too much food.

School Standards and Framework Bill

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

6.29 pm

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): Madam Deputy Speaker—[HON. MEMBERS: "Madam Speaker."] Sorry, Madam Speaker—I do apologise. It is so nice to see you in the Chamber at this stage in a debate.

Madam Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is not being very helpful to himself; I think that he had better start again and get it right.

Mr. Foster: I am most grateful to you, Madam Speaker, for giving me this opportunity to wish you a very happy Christmas.

I should like to make it absolutely clear that we shall be voting with the Government this evening to give the Bill a Second Reading. We believe that it is an important Bill that contains many important and exciting ideas that will be responsible for levering up standards in our schools; they are ideas that deserve our full support. Just as I congratulate the Secretary of State for Education and Employment on what I suppose, in "Yes, Minister" terminology, may be described as his brave and outspoken attack on those who seek to erode support for the disabled, I also congratulate him on introducing the Bill.

However, in supporting the Bill's Second Reading, I hope that my action will not be interpreted as uncritical acceptance of all aspects of the Bill as currently drafted. While we enthusiastically endorse some, indeed many, of the proposals, we believe that others are misguided or, at least, in need of significant revision in Committee. A few of the proposals, not least those in relation to the proposed framework for schools, are downright harmful to the education service and should be dropped altogether.

In summary, perhaps we could describe the Bill as the good, the bad and the ugly. I am sure that the Secretary of State will understand if I concentrate this evening on those aspects of the Bill about which we have concerns. But in doing so, I would not want to obscure our genuine delight in the Bill's overall tone, its emphasis on partnership and co-operation and its plans to reduce class size, introduce baseline assessment, establish education action zones, give local education authorities a statutory role in raising standards in their schools and, particularly, ensure once and for all that we have seen the back of nursery vouchers, which are to be replaced with sensible plans to expand the provision of high-quality early years education.

Before I turn to some specific proposals, there is one general point of concern on which I wish to touch. Both Liberal Democrats and the Labour party vociferously complained about the way in which, under the Conservatives, each successive Education Act further increased the power of the Secretary of State, who was given nearly 500 additional powers in the Education Reform Act 1988 alone. It is therefore somewhat of a surprise to discover that, once in office, the Labour party is continuing the trend; for this Bill is also a centralising Bill. It contains numerous clauses under which the Secretary of State is to issue regulations, guidance or codes of conduct. I have not had the opportunity to carry out a full analysis, but on my current estimate, the Secretary of State's additional powers range between 70 and 100.

The Liberal Democrats believe that it is the job of central Government to establish the framework and provide the resources, then to allow those on the ground—not least the professional teachers—to get on with the job. Of course, to do so they need additional resources—the tools to do the job, including books, equipment and decent buildings in which to work. In that sense, I agreed with the shadow Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), when he called for more money, although he has a huge cheek to do so. He must be suffering from chronic amnesia, for he has forgotten that, over 18 years, the Conservative Government starved our schools of resources. One thing that those on the ground do not need is what the Secretary of State's senior adviser, Mr. Michael Barber, recently recommended, when he talked of the "unrelenting pressure from the centre".

I shall now turn to some specific aspects of the Bill. In doing so, I shall inevitably have to omit some points that I should like to have raised in detail, had I had more time. My questions include: why are the Government so keen to reintroduce nutritional standards for schools, but have not yet taken the opportunity to reintroduce minimum space standards for schools? Why have they not sought a more sensible approach to accountability arrangements for governing bodies? Why are they continuing with the system of the annual governors' meeting for parents, with a handful of governors meeting late on a wet Thursday night and sitting on undersized chairs? Why have they not sought a more sensible approach? Why have they rightly added a clause to prohibit corporal punishment on pupils for whom nursery education is provided or supported by the LEA, but failed to extend that ban to cover pupils in privately run nursery provision? In particular, why have they not used the Bill as an opportunity to overturn the damaging effects of the Greenwich judgment on school admission policies?

We fully support the plans to reintroduce maximum class sizes for five, six and seven-year-olds—a measure that will reverse a decision made by a previous Labour Government. We nevertheless believe that the plans could be more ambitious. We must remember that there are 480,000 five, six and seven-year-olds in classes of more than 30, but there are about 780,000 older primary pupils who suffer from the same problem and whose education is similarly damaged. Surely, therefore, we should be seeking to reduce class sizes for all primary school pupils—infant and junior. We shall be seeking to move an amendment to that effect.

We recognise the costs and other implications of what we seek to achieve. I do not believe that the Government have fully appreciated the implications of their own proposals. There are three specific problems. First, insufficient money will be released from the abandonment of the assisted places scheme to pay for the large number of additional teachers and classrooms required. I have seen the Government's cost implications and estimates in the financial memorandum to the Bill, and I believe that they are whistling in the dark.

Secondly, it is by no means clear that, even if the additional funds are made available, there will be sufficient teachers available. I am sad to say that teachers are leaving the profession in droves: 20,000 have left in the past 12 months. On the other side of the coin, we know that fewer and fewer quality candidates are being recruited to start training to enter the profession.

Thirdly, I am genuinely concerned that there may be insufficient flexibility in the approach to class size reduction to take account of local circumstances. We shall still need to know how the Government expect a local education authority to deal with the arrival of the 31st child of a particular age group, hoping to attend a small village school. Will he be sent a long distance to another school to meet the requirements of the class size ban, or will there be some flexibility?

When the Minister for School Standards responds, will he say, given his understandable desire to reduce class sizes, what he will do in terms of schools, particularly small schools, that will be using non-qualified teachers—not least those who are in their probationary year or those who are training?

I very much support the Government's plans to involve local education authorities in their effort to raise standards, but more details will be needed. In the White Paper we read:

"If we are to hold LEAs to account for their performance, we owe it to them to ensure that they have a clear job description".

But, sadly, the Bill does not provide that clear job description. It does not even provide a list of the functions that an LEA will be expected to perform and to be funded for under the new financial arrangements. Those are clearly matters for the Committee to consider, and I look forward to receiving more information than is provided in the Bill.

On the subject of LEAs, I have two more points to raise. First, if LEAs are to be given the crucial role of raising standards in their schools, it is strange that their involvement in the appointment of head teachers is to be so severely diminished. After all, all the research shows that one of the most crucial factors in a school's success or failure is the skill, expertise and talents of the head teacher. Although it is right that governors should take the final decision, it is important that LEAs, which are to be intimately involved in ensuring success in individual schools, should have a role to play in headship appointment that is greater than that which is currently envisaged.

Secondly, although I accept and welcome the Secretary of State's decision to return to local level more powers to determine school reorganisation, I am unconvinced by the proposed means of doing so. The Bill envisages the establishment of school organisation committees, yet it is the LEA that is constitutionally responsible for securing the supply of school places. Therefore, decisions should rest with the elected LEA, not with a separate unelected body that does not even have to meet the financial or other consequences of its decisions. If school organisation committees are to be established, they should have no more than an advisory function.

Similarly, I am concerned about the role of the adjudicator in determining appeals in respect of reorganisation plans. The role should be like that of an ombudsman—limited to determining whether there is proper consultation and whether the decision is legal. It would be wholly wrong for the adjudicator to be given power, as appears to be envisaged, to take an alternative view on policy.

In respect of education action zones, the main difference between myself and the Government is simple: they believe that education action zones are a good thing, whereas I believe that they are a phenomenally good thing. They are one of the most exciting aspects of the Bill. They will bring meaning to the concept of partnership and could ensure a real impetus to drive up standards. They will provide something that is currently missing from our education system—the ability for professionals at local level to experiment and share best practice.

I hope that almost every LEA will lobby for the establishment of a zone in its area. I am aware of the problems, and the right hon. Member for Charnwood raised some of them—for example, the problem of so-called boundary effects, with differential funding of schools on either side of the boundary. I am also aware of concerns about the possibility of opting out of national pay arrangements. However, those problems can be overcome.

There are other issues that require greater clarification—for example, which powers will individual school governors be allowed to hand over to the forum? How will the work of forums be co-ordinated with other initiatives, such as early excellence centres, health action zones and regeneration initiatives? Perhaps most important, how will funding be arranged? After all, if a zone is to run for three to five years, it would be wholly wrong and almost impossible for it to operate if it has to stick with a process of annual bidding for funding.

May I urge the Minister to make one specific change to the policy, which is to include LEA representatives in education action zone forums? When the Secretary of State launched his education action zone proposals on 15 April this year, I read with interest that "These pilots will be planned and delivered by partnerships between business, schools and LEAs".

I do not believe that the Secretary of State can have changed his mind in such a short time, so I must assume that the absence of LEA representation on the forums is a mistake and one that I hope will be shortly rectified.

I described the Bill as the good, the bad and the ugly, and I turn now to what I believe to be the ugly—those aspects of the Bill that deal with the framework for schools and with selection. We all remember that, long before the election, the Labour party rightly urged us all to concentrate on standards and not on structures; but, as the right hon. Member for Charnwood said, because such a major part of the Bill is devoted to structures, the Government themselves are forcing our attention on to structures and away from standards. I have three brief points to make in that respect.

In opposition, the Labour party joined the Liberal Democrats in combined opposition to grant- maintained status. It is a great pity that, in government, the Labour party is appeasing GM schools. There is no justification for the establishment of foundation schools. GM schools could and should be returned to the LEA framework. It cannot be argued, as some Labour Members have done, that there is no difference in effect between community and foundation schools; if that were true, there would be no need for a separate status.

The only reason for the establishment of foundation schools is as a sop to those relatively few parents who supported GM status. What is bizarre is that the Government are taking this step at a time when there is little enthusiasm for foundation status.

Mr. Dafis: It is especially bizarre that the legislation will create an entire category for, in Wales, a total of 17 schools out of 3,000.

Mr. Foster: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right, and I am glad that he shares my view that the measure is bizarre. I am sure that he will share my delight at the likelihood of the Roman Catholic diocesan education authorities advising their current GM schools to avoid foundation status, and the possibility of the Church of England authorities following suit.

With the exception of the few parents I mentioned, perhaps the only real excitement about foundation status comes from those consultants who are rubbing their hands with glee at the thought of all the extra business they hope to attract. The Minister may already be aware of organisations such as the Centre for Education Management Ltd., which runs foundation school conferences aimed specifically at

"the substantial number of county schools across the country who are affected by local government reorganisation and a potential deterioration of service."

It is quite clear that that organisation knows something about the benefits of foundation status that, so far, I have missed.

Mr. McLoughlin: Why does the hon. Gentleman put so much faith in local education authorities, which can hold back so much money from schools, whereas GM schools receive their money directly?

Mr. Foster: If the hon. Gentleman is so keen on that approach, I am surprised that he will be trooping through the Lobby against the Second Reading of the Bill. As he will know, the Bill contains the plans for a whole new financial settlement, which will make clear the respective jobs, responsibilities and funding of schools and local education authorities. Given the view he has expressed, I am sure that he will change his mind and join us in the Aye Lobby later tonight.

We know that there is little support for foundation status among local education authorities. The Minister knows the figures—he gave them to me in a written reply, and I will remind him what he wrote:

"Some 70 per cent. of LEAs raised concerns about foundation school category, of which some two thirds are Labour-controlled authorities."—[Official Report, 17 November 1997; Vol. 301, c. 29.]

The Minister knows that there is no need and no desire for the provisions in this part of the Bill, and that they should be dropped.

There has been one significant change that has occurred between the White Paper and the Bill that no one can fathom. In the Bill, we read about the allocation of grant-maintained special schools to the category of foundation special schools, but such an option was effectively ruled out in the White Paper. Even more recently, the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris), produced her extremely good Green Paper on special educational needs, in which the Government stated that they were against foundation status for special schools because "of the importance we attach to the place of special schools in a unified service supporting greater inclusion."

There has been a sudden and dramatic U-turn on the part of the Government, so it would appear that 21 GM special schools have a significantly greater influence on the Government than the majority of LEAs, including Labour-controlled ones, whose views have fallen on deaf ears.

Finally, I shall discuss grammar schools and selection. I welcome the fact that the Government are giving an opportunity at local level for reconsideration of grammar school status, but I believe that the mechanism that they propose, with a cumbersome, bureaucratic, ballot system, is wrong, and that it would be far better for the decision to be left, after consultation, to the LEAs.

Even more bizarrely, we are witnessing another U-turn on the issue of partial selection. In his 1995 Labour party conference speech, the present Secretary of State said:

"Watch my lips: no selection by exams or interview under Labour."

Yet what do we find in the Bill? The Government accept no new introduction of partial selection by ability, but existing arrangements can remain unless there is both a challenge and a decision by the adjudicator that it must end. That gives no guarantee that all existing partial selection would end—yet that was promised, and that is what should be delivered.

I have been obliged to focus on the bits of the Bill about which we are concerned, but there are many good bits, measures that we believe will help to achieve what we all seek: the raising of standards in our schools and the establishment of an education service that delivers excellence for all. We shall work in Committee to change some aspects of the Bill, but the Government can be assured of our support for the main thrust of the Bill. Therefore we shall support the Second Reading tonight.

Several hon. Members rose-

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As it has been some time since the debate started, before I call the hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) I remind the House that Madam Speaker has placed a 10-minute limit on all Back-Bench speeches.

6.50 pm

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall keep my comments brief.

I very much welcome the School Standards and Framework Bill, because of the need to tackle the low educational achievement in my constituency. I shall focus on those problems in my speech.

My local authority is taking steps to tackle those problems in a five-year educational plan, which I shall refer to if time permits. Some of the problems that have occurred in my constituency are a direct result of the previous Government's policies. One of their policies was to close down the major employer, the coal industry, and another was to starve my local authority of the resources that it required to maintain local government services.

[Mr. Eric Illsley]

The local authority has tried to re-industrialise the borough, but one reason why we have not made significant progress in that regard is the low educational achievement in our schools. Employers are discouraged from investing in the Barnsley area because of the low level of achievement and, obviously, they would not want their children to attend school in an area that does not do as well as other areas.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Illsley: No; there is no time.

In my constituency, there is a culture of low achievement and low aspirations. Schoolchildren feel that achieving qualifications is pointless because of a shortage of employment opportunities after they leave school. Worse, some teachers feel the same. They think that it is pointless to try to teach schoolchildren to achieve GCSE qualifications because of the culture of low achievement and low aspirations.

I shall mention some of the problems that exist in my constituency and I shall refer to the White Paper, "Excellence in Schools", which refers to the problems of changes in the nature of employment, which have led to educational changes.

Until a few years ago, the major employer in my constituency was the coal industry. Although the industry brought benefits of stability, long-term, relatively well-paid jobs, and educational facilities—including apprenticeships, day release courses and educational opportunities through industry—it also brought problems. There was a reliance on a single industry, and a culture of low achievement and low aspiration resulted. People did not aspire beyond working in that industry.

As a result of the closure of the coal industry a few years ago, employment in my constituency fell by 19 per cent. between 1981 and 1991. Coopers and Lybrand has estimated that to reach the national average level of employment we would need to create 19,000 jobs in the constituency by 2001—a practically impossible task, made more difficult by low educational achievement and the low aspirations of the community. Gross domestic product per head in South Yorkshire is low, at 76 per cent., well below the national average, which causes problems.

That brings me to the figures for educational attainment in my constituency. Despite recent improvements, only 28 per cent. of Barnsley pupils obtain five or more A to C grades at GCSE. The national average, which is itself low, is 44 per cent.

Other local problems include high and rising crime. In 1979, crime in Barnsley was 25 per cent. below the national average; by 1994, it was 13 per cent. above it. Many people receive council tax benefits or have long-term debilitating injuries or illness. Those are the problems that have caused the culture of low achievement.

In 1989 in Barnsley, on average 15 per cent. of children gained five or more A to C passes at GCSE. In 1995, the figure was 28 per cent. In 1996 it was 28.3 per cent., compared to a national average of 44 per cent.

Barnsley pupils do not reach the national average level of attainment at any stage at which they are tested. At key stage 1, we score 75 per cent. compared with a national average of 79. At age 14, we score 46 per cent. compared with a national average of 57 and at GCSE we score 28 per cent.

I fully support the Bill, because those low achievement levels must be tackled. I agree entirely with the passage in the White Paper "Excellence in Schools":

> "One of the most powerful underlying reasons for low performance in our schools has been low expectations which have allowed poor quality teaching to continue unchallenged. Too many teachers, parents and pupils have come to accept a ceiling on achievement which is far below what is possible."

That exactly sums up the problem in my constituency.

I especially welcome the proposals to introduce educational development plans, but I am disappointed that the duty on the local education authority to agree targets with schools has been dropped. Targets would have been welcome in the situation that exists in my constituency.

As I said, my local authority has embarked on a plan to improve educational standards, which draws on much that is in the White Paper and the Bill. However, although the local education authority is trying to increase standards and improve pupils' performance it is coming up against teachers who do not accept that GCSEs are a standard—who do not accept that they are the be-all and end-all of education. Perhaps they are not, but in my constituency the education system is failing children because their inability to achieve qualifications prevents them from passing into further and higher education or into decent jobs.

I wish that the Minister would address that problem and enable local education authorities to impose standards or targets on schools, especially in areas such as mine. The teachers' view is that their job is to produce well-rounded individuals, as the head teachers put it, instead of enabling pupils to gain qualifications.

I shall now mention specialist schools. A school in my constituency, Priory school, aspires to specialise in sport. Unfortunately, to do so it must raise about £100,000, and in an area such as mine that money is very difficult to obtain, although the school is committed, with a forward-thinking head teacher and excellent staff. I ask the Minister to consider whether support might be given to schools such as that, to kick-start the process of achieving specialist status.

The Barnsley education partnership is an excellent venture. It uses partnership and collaboration with the local colleges, such as Northern college and Bretton college, with the local universities, the Government office for Yorkshire and the Humber, the Barnsley Business Education Partnership, the health authority, the police, the trades union council, the voluntary sector, the Churches, the chamber of commerce and many more. The aim is to raise aspirations, and to improve the culture of education.

We have a problem, however. Despite an increase of more than £4 million in our standard spending assessment this year—notionally—the authority is still £2.5 million short, in cash terms, of money to spend on education. I shall be meeting local government Ministers next week to try to secure funds from other sources. It is obvious that, if we are to improve standards, implement the Bill and maintain the plan on which the local authority has embarked, we shall need more resources. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will support Barnsley's case.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): I shall confine myself to two aspects of the Bill. The first is the education action zone; the second is parental ballots, and the future of grammar schools.

I feel that education action zones should be effectively integrated in wider regeneration programmes, especially in inner cities. We know from our experience of regeneration that dealing with only one aspect of deprivation does not work. It is necessary to deal with housing, training, the environment, policing, law and order, and job availability. We have learnt that the issue must be dealt with in the round. Our main problem was involving educational institutions. I am not talking about those in charge of training; that was easy enough. I am talking about actually getting down to the schools. The problem was partly due to the Department's marked reluctance to become involved in the programmes.

We know why the problems are so deep-rooted in some inner-city primary schools. My father was headmaster of a primary school that was within site of Armley gaol in Leeds for many years, and our family therefore experienced those problems in a very practical way. We knew about the low expectations of many teaching staff, we knew about the culture of non-achievement, and we knew how desperate some family backgrounds were when all the bad elements were combined. There is much to be said for education action zones as a concept, but they must be integrated into the wider regeneration programme.

The question is, how is that to be achieved at a time when the regeneration programmes themselves are about to undergo significant change? First, the new regional development agencies are intended to take over the management of the programmes; secondly, the Government are reputed to be toying with the idea of moving to a different concept of regeneration—the French idea of "contrats de ville"—rather than using the single regeneration budget, which is applicable throughout the country. "Contrats de ville" are contracts between the centre and urban areas, and do not have universal coverage.

It is crucial that there should be no dislocation. Will the education action zones be urged to apply for regeneration funds, or a replacement? Will they be part of a wider partnership—a real partnership, with the zones performing one of the functions that are required? What measures will the Government take to ensure that the concept of education action zones is part of the broader regeneration effort?

As our experience tells us, the concept will not work if the Government do not take such measures; but I hope very much that it will work. We shall start putting the inner cities right when we start putting primary schools right, and changing the attitudes of parents, staff and local people, who must have ownership of the schemes.

My second worry is about the future of grammar schools, which affects my constituency. North Yorkshire has a countywide selective system. I need to know what the Government intend for ballots. Who will vote? Will it be parents of children at primary schools, which are the feeder schools? Will it be "one vote, one child", or "one vote, one family"? Will parents of children at secondary schools have a vote? Will voting be confined to the catchment areas of the schools involved, or are we talking about the education authorities as a whole?

Let me explain why that matters by referring to my old school, Ripon grammar school. When I was at that school, it was not part of the educational elite: passing Latin O-level was regarded as a singular achievement. Ripon grammar school draws from 14 primary schools in its catchment area. The most pupils it takes from those schools is 18; the fewest is one; quite often, it takes one or two. It also draws from 11 primary schools outside its catchment area, often taking one or two pupils. In addition, it draws from eight independent primary schools—between one and four pupils—and it happens to be a boarding school as well.

In those circumstances, who will have a vote? Will all the parents who are sending one child a year to a primary school have a vote? Will parents outside the catchment area have a vote?

Ripon grammar school is outstanding. It is at the top of the league tables—as it ought to be: North Yorkshire has a selective system, and we do not have the massive social problems that characterise more urban areas. If we cannot do well, we clearly are not trying.

Ever since I was brought up in Ripon, there have been arguments between the grammar school, which I attended and which happens to be on one side of the road, and the secondary modern on the other side of the road—now called Ripon city school—where my father taught. There has been a flight of pupils to Boroughbridge, Harrogate and other areas, because of the problems that are perceived to exist in the city school.

The city school, however, is now making enormous strides. For the last couple of years, it has had a new headmaster, Mr. Paul Lowery, who has said, "I am not interested in this lack of expectation. I am not interested in assuming that these kids are only good enough to work as check-out operatives in multiple retail stores. I think that they can do something, and I look forward to the school's having a graduate society."

The school now has a sixth form, and an extensive community education programme. It intends to apply for special status as a technology school. When the application is submitted, I shall be lobbying the Minister. Numbers are going up at the school, and its results are improving, because attitudes and expectations have changed. The last thing it needs is the upheaval of reorganisation.

It would help if the North Yorkshire education authority stopped using the city school—because it had spare places; because it experienced a period of decline—as a place in which to put kids who have had problems in all the other schools: as a collective for local difficulties.

Every time Mr. Lowery tries to pull the school up another notch, he experiences the dislocation caused by people being dropped on him throughout the school year by the LEA. It would be enormously helpful to him if that stopped, and he was given a real opportunity to attack some of the school's problems. He is managing to do that, however: examination results have improved vastly, as has the whole atmosphere in the school. That happened because someone said, "It can be done," rather than, "I do not think that it can be done."

[Mr. David Curry]

The sensible thing for Ripon to do is develop twin schools with different but equal excellence, able to work together when that is in the best interests of the children. One school may be more academically inclined and the other more vocationally inclined, but children should be able to cross the road when the courses are mixed in order to get the best from both schools.

I know that both Mr. Lowery—headmaster of the city school—and Mr. Alan Jones, headmaster of the grammar school, subscribe to that vision of the future of education in Ripon, and that neither thinks that it would be good for them or their schools if we embarked on another period of debate about the structure. That argument has plagued Ripon for generations, and those years of guerrilla warfare—all the uncertainty, bitterness and division that happen in a small community like Ripon—must end. A full stop must be written at the end of those paragraphs.

South Craven school in my constituency is at the opposite extreme. It is probably the biggest all-in comprehensive in North Yorkshire. It is an excellent school, but it takes literally hundreds of children from Bradford metropolitan authority. We can see why people are fleeing from that authority, but, in fact, many children go there by choice. Will the parents have a say in any ballot on the future of education in North Yorkshire, which is vital to them?

If there are ballots, what will be the role of the local education authority? I hope that it will be told to have no role at all. I do not want the LEA to influence the ballot; I do not want it to use its resources to send circulars to all the parents, and try to secure one or other result. We have seen that happen in the past. Local education authorities should be ready to implement what parents decide is right for them. I hope that the Government will be on guard against that, and against unrepresentative pressure groups that always emerge on such occasions.

Will the Minister contemplate change only when it is clear both that the opinion of all parents concerned is in favour, and that there are undisputable educational advantages to be gained from reorganisation? Change too often takes place as a result of a sustained third of dislocation, community unease and guerrilla war in local communities. If we can put an end to that, we can do education a great service.

I trust the Minister's good will. He wants to get the argument settled, as most people do. It would help if he would spell that out tonight.

7.9 pm

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): I am glad to follow the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry). I welcome this measure—yet another manifesto commitment fulfilled. When the Secretary of State introduced the Bill to the House, he had every reason to be proud. It is landmark legislation, the intention of which approximates the achievements of the Education Act 1944.

I welcome the references to maximum class sizes, the safeguarding of the religious ethic, school meals, nutritional standards and work-related learning, among other provisions. I particularly welcome the strengthening of ministerial powers. So far as I can see, the Bill is a centralising measure. The able Minister for School Standards now has his hands on the levers of power in an unprecedented way—[Interruption.] Conservative Members may not like it, but that is the Bill's long-term impact. Some LEAs, many of them Conservative, have failed both pupils and schools. If the Minister wants to grip them firmly by the throat, he now has the power to do so.

If giving unprecedented strong powers to the schools Minister helps to improve failing schools, and helps vulnerable pupils to achieve their full potential, so be it. If it livens up errant LEAs, so much the better.

I want the measure to help poor children from homes that lack some aspects of life that we would like them to have. Too many children grow up on decrepit, aging, featureless council estates. To put it bluntly, at this time of year their homes are not warm; their diet is suspect; and the streets that surround their homes are haunted by vandals who give a bad example to young schoolchildren. There is too much shabbiness and squalor, and there is often a drugs culture.

In those neighbourhoods and on those estates, many of which exist throughout the land, there are break-ins and intimidation by yobbish gangs. On some of those streets where youngsters go daily to school, there are more jobless than employed people. In those localities, marriages and partnerships simply fall apart, which results in a weakened social fabric.

Many youngsters experience a series of temporary, sometimes resident fathers. Children stay up late at night and often watch unacceptable videos at a late hour. That is no preparation for school the next day. Do they get a reasonable breakfast? Are they adequately dressed for the cold? Too often, school is the only place where children are told what is right and what is wrong, because the attitude of some parents—perhaps many—towards their young children is irresponsible.

The Bill is overdue. I hope that it will enhance and develop the lives of tens of thousands of children who live in poverty, cold, neglect and ignorance. Any ubiquitous and observant Member of Parliament will remain haunted by the evidence of children growing up in areas of social breakdown, which exist throughout the land. The problem I define is growing worse by the month. I hope that the Bill will give a better deal to many young children.

Social justice is one of the Government's prime objectives, and the Bill draws inspiration from the need for social justice.

Mr. Hayes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jones: No, I cannot give way, as my speech is limited to 10 minutes. I mean no discourtesy to the hon. Gentleman, who might know my area and have an insight into the problems there.

Children should be the first recipients of social justice, but many of them miss out hopelessly and often. This historic Bill will enhance the lives and prospects of countless thousands of children, but it is a tall order for me even to hope for that objective, which is why I welcome the social exclusion unit and the impact which I expect it will have on schooling. The unit and the Bill will together make inroads into the scandalous conditions in which many children live and learn. With the Prime Minister at the helm, good will come of the unit's work.

The social exclusion unit's analysis of the worst housing estates must be crucial, and I look forward to its report and to the action that it will propose between Government Departments. Many primary and comprehensive schools are located within, or on the edge of, vast housing estates. The huge social problems march straight into the neighbourhood schools, and teachers therefore must cease to be professors of knowledge and face up to everyday school emergencies as social workers, mothers, fathers, nurses and comforters.

I therefore make a cautionary plea to the Government. Teachers groan as legislation follows legislation. They feel overwhelmed by paper and threatened by ceaseless inspections and the publicity about the consequential disclosure of the inspector's findings. The demands about which they complain are Conservative Government demands, but this Bill will ask even more of the profession. Even more pressure will therefore be put on teachers, who already have very low morale. We must take account of that.

Headmasters must now be accountants, publicists, marketing directors, clerks of works, politicians and diplomats. The pressure on headmasters grows and grows, and too many of them seek an early exit from their responsibilities. I urge the Government to take that into account.

This is a good Bill, and I want it implemented speedily. Above all, I hope that it will help children from poor homes.

7.18 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): This is the time of magic in the theatre. Children will be queueing to see people flying without wires and generally performing all kinds of magical tricks. There is an assumption in this debate that, if only we had the best possible Act of Parliament, all kinds of terrible things would cease to be, and children would instantly warm to their school, parents would take their responsibilities seriously, teachers would enjoy their jobs, and before you could say Jack Robinson—

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Geoffrey Robinson.

Mr. Rowe:—or even Geoffrey Robinson, all the problems would be solved.

Coming from Kent, I have strong reservations about the Bill. It is true that Kent, like areas that are wholly comprehensive, has some under-performing schools, but some of the under-performing schools have already improved enormously as a result of going grant-maintained. I echo the experience of my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry). One of my local schools that took itself out of the local education authority's control has now created a sixth form which it was being denied, and this year for the first time has pupils going to Oxford and Cambridge.

Chance is to be taken away. Our county has an extraordinarily rich tradition of grammar schools, and they are by and large centres of excellence. Good education is a strangely delicate plant, which blossoms unpredictably and shrivels equally unpredictably. Experience suggests that it has most chance of continuous success where there are communities with a long history of academic excellence. To undermine such communities through Act of Parliament, even if that is on a tendentious ballot, would not be wise.

I welcome the Bill's approval of centres of aptitude, but I bitterly regret its hostility to grant-maintained and grammar schools. In view of earlier exchanges, it is worth recalling that Kent has this time passed on every penny of the extra money that has been handed out to schools, in stark contrast to the Lib-Lab pact, the predecessor of the Conservative Administration, which kept £10 million out of £16 million.

New Labour should be proud of the Bill. It features at least two of new Labour's central beliefs: first, in central control—the man in Whitehall knows best; and secondly, that the best way to deal with people's failings is to punish them. "Zero tolerance" and "hit squads" are the key phrases here.

I understand. It is a natural reaction to the shocking waste of young people, which is still a feature of our education system. Eleven years of compulsory attendance under threat of penal sanctions should lead to delivery of something worth having, or the penal sanctions should be scrapped.

If I buy a duff product in a shop, I can get my investment back. If I buy a house on a false prospectus, I can get redress. If, under legal sanction, I send my child to a school which delivers to the child nothing of value, I have no redress at all. Is it not time to have a proper, enforceable contract with schools, or no doubt with the Secretary of State, if the Bill is passed in its present form?

The contract with parents may help some families and some schools in some areas, but it is no substitute for a properly enforceable contract whereby the school promises to deliver certain things, the parents and the child promise in return to make themselves available in the appropriate ways, and if nothing worth having is delivered at the end, there should be some redress.

I have some sympathy with ministerial impatience, but I am astonished at how little the Secretary of State said about the central element in all education—teachers. Teachers need a new deal. The world of any teacher who has been in the profession for more than 20 years has changed beyond recognition. That is a result not just of new technology, with which we must all come to terms, but of an entirely new social environment.

In many schools, the majority of pupils come from broken homes, and for many of those children, being dropped at the school gates may be no opportunity, but may be seen rather as another rejection. Huge numbers of pupils come to school with few or no social skills, no self-discipline, and no respect for any adult, including the teacher.

With every new social problem handed to teachers has come a further restriction on their traditional systems of control, yet most teachers have been left to handle these difficult developments with little or no serious support. As a result, they have too often low self-confidence and low expectations of their charges. It is therefore not surprising how hard many of them find it, for example, to welcome volunteer help or to deploy it if they get it.

We know from research that the most effective way of cutting truancy is by teaching in a way that holds the interest of pupils. The Government would do better to concentrate on retraining current teachers and improving the training of aspirant teachers than to threaten them with hit squads and other punitive instruments. None of us can feel content with the present situation—a shortfall last year of more than 2,000 entering initial teacher training, one third of those who successfully completed initial teacher training in 1995 not being employed as teachers, and 10,200 leaving the profession for other employment in 1995-96.

Instead of yet again messing about with structure, including destroying proven successful structures, why do not the new Labour Government concentrate on the most valuable resource at their disposal—the teachers? It is 15 years since I came within an ace of establishing with private finance the first distance staff college for head teachers. I still believe that to take a leaf out of the armed services' book and provide a staff college for putative head teachers would be one of the most effective ways of achieving higher standards.

What teachers want more than anything else is other teachers to assist them in improving their standards, not being told how to do it from outside.

Jacqui Smith (Redditch) rose—

Mr. Rowe: No, I am sorry. With a 10-minute limit, we always lose the enjoyable experience of being broken in upon.

What we teach is important, and it is different from what many people think. Recent studies have shown, for example, that pupils find religious education surprisingly enjoyable. They discover for the first time that there is another element to their lives, apart from the purely materialistic.

I believe that that is one of the areas in which we should develop our skills. We should also, as I have often said in the House—the Minister knows my views—develop voluntary help in schools much further. Most teachers would welcome the opportunity to extend their grasp through responsible voluntary assistance. Pupils learn faster by teaching other pupils some of the things they need to know—especially subjects such as health education, or how to deal with bullying or racial harassment. There are good examples of that which can work extremely well. If older pupils teach younger pupils, both sides profit enormously.

Finally, we should put a great deal of emphasis on the development of the volunteer involvement of employees of local businesses in schools. Not only does that extend the skills of the volunteers and those they teach, but it involves the businesses in the local school. The more we can draw schools into community involvement, the better.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Rothwell): If we must meet in Christmas week, it is just as well that we should consider some glad tidings. The Bill is extremely positive, and I congratulate the Government on their single-minded drive to improve standards in education. I welcome the greater involvement of the local education authorities. After 18 years of the Tories drawing education power to the centre, I am glad that at last some authority is returning to the LEAs.

The Government clearly take seriously the principle of partnership. The Bill draws in schools, teachers, governors, parents, pupils, business, the training and enterprise councils and central Government in raising standards across the board.

We must also bear in mind the fact that the Government are making resources available in order to achieve the class size objective. Resources are important if we are to raise education standards. The Government have allocated nearly an extra £2.5 billion to schools, including £1 billion from the contingency reserve and the new deal for schools from 1998-99, and they will provide another £1.3 billion in grants for school maintenance over the next five years. I think that that is proof of the Government's commitment of resources as well as ideas in their single-minded drive to improve education standards.

With regard to the role of parents as envisaged in the Bill, the Jesuit cliché, "Give me the child at five and I will show you the man"—apart from its one-sided focus on the male of the species and its underrating of the years from zero to four—contains the essential truth that the early years of a child's development play a profound part in determining his or her life chances. I am glad that the Bill recognises, as the Secretary of State said when presenting the White Paper in July, that parents are a child's first teachers. Rather than treating that as a mere truism, the Bill contains concrete ideas for ensuring that parents are more involved in enhancing the life chances of their children from early years, through their school years, until they leave school and, sooner or later, the family home. More than that, the Bill contains concrete mechanisms for involving parents in the success of their child's school, and therefore of the community in which they live.

I shall comment on just two measures. First, I turn to the home-school contract. Leeds local education authority, in common with many others, already promotes parental commitment via home-school contracts. When I consulted parents and teachers in my constituency over the summer to gauge their reaction to the White Paper, they suggested that, while home-school contracts are a good idea, they need more legal strength in order to do the job. Therefore, I am pleased that the Government have chosen to put on the face of the Bill the requirement for parents to sign home-school contracts and for governors to ensure that they do so unless exceptional circumstances apply. However, in time, the Government may wish to consider ensuring that contracts are a condition of admission and that failure to observe the requirements of a home-school contract brings a legal sanction upon the head of the parent or guardian.

The contracts spell out that parents also have the right to expect the school and its teachers to display a minimum of good practice in teaching the pupils, just as the school has a right to expect the co-operation of parents. I would want to avoid any problems associated with legal claims for damages on the basis of a pupil's performance, but I think that we must consider the strength of home-school contracts. In addition, the Bill provides for parent governors in schools. Parents must have a genuinely representative voice on boards of governors, which, together with their presence on LEA committees, will help to cement the partnership that the Bill tries to bring about.

Secondly, the Bill gives various roles to LEAs after 18 years of Conservative hostility to those authorities—it was clear from the way in which the Conservatives presented their policies during the election campaign that LEAs would have ceased to exist if the Conservatives had won the election. I welcome the participation of LEAs and their commitment to raising standards. That can be seen in several specific ways. It is a matter not just of warm words and pious hopes but of definite proposals to enhance co-operation between schools, schools and LEAs, between LEAs, and with other key community and education stakeholders.

We can see that in the proposals for school organisation committees and in the role that LEAs will play in producing early years development plans and development plans that will apply in each area. LEAs will make a constructive and positive impact on the way in which schools approach the raising of standards: their duty will be to promote higher standards. Ofsted may be brought into a school at the behest of the LEA and emergency teams may be sent in by the Secretary of State when a LEA is judged to have failed. Schools will be required to produce capability procedures for removing teachers who are deemed to be poor performers. Those measures will give LEAs a bigger role in ensuring schools take education standards seriously.

Mention was made today of education action zones, which are another option open to LEAs. That proposal has been broadly welcomed, so I shall not dwell upon it now. Education action zones will be particularly important in deprived areas.

I must also comment on class sizes. It is important that we take class size seriously and that we recognise that it matters. For years, I heard Conservative Education Ministers claiming that there was no evidence that pupil performance improved as class sizes were reduced. The abolition of the assisted places scheme is already releasing money under the standards fund that will be used to help infant schools to realise our class size objective and pledge.

However, we cannot legislate for a change to class sizes of 30 or under for all five, six and seven-year-olds in one fell swoop. According to the House of Commons Library, there are as many as 13,502 classes of 31 pupils or over. Speaking to teachers, I found that they rejected any attempt to force a rigid number upon all infant classes within a short time scale—not through any scepticism that the objective was worth realising, but through concern about over-rigidity of prescriptiveness and resources. That concern is shared widely by teachers and local authority representatives alike.

Thankfully, the class size commitment in the Bill is not too prescriptive. It allows the Secretary of State to set class size targets, but they may be determined according to age within the infant school sector and will, I hope, not follow too tight a timetable. The Bill also allows LEAs to draw up proposals for realising the class size objective, thereby allowing local factors to be taken into consideration. Unless flexibility is introduced into the school appeals system, not only will the ability of schools to achieve the class size objective be undermined, but the distance that some children must travel to school will frustrate attempts to encourage parents to give a commitment to the school beyond securing their child's place at it.

The Bill makes clear that parental preference must not

"prejudice the provision of efficient education or the efficient use of resources", which includes the duty of the LEA to comply with the class size commitment. Given that the Greenwich judgment is still very much in place and that appeals increased by more than 8,500 to 62,900 in the period from 1994–95 to 1995–96, that is good news for schools that are wondering how they can achieve the Government's objective. I also welcome the fact that the Bill states that an LEA's power to direct a school to admit a pupil shall likewise be in accordance with the class size objective and that the school should be a "reasonable distance from the child's home."

The need to encourage parental commitment to schools, and thus to their communities, is inevitably compromised by the right to send children many miles away from home in pursuit of a place that may lie in another LEA area. I am glad that the Government have adopted a flexible approach to the class size question.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): I could not disagree more with the first few words of the speech by the hon. Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Gunnell) when he welcomed the Bill for giving more powers to local education authorities. Looking back on my experiences with my local education authority, I think that any Bill that gives LEAs more power is to be regretted.

We heard the exchanges between the Secretary of State and the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) earlier today. There is a long-running argument in Derbyshire about the amount of money that central Government have given the county council and, at the end of the day, how much of that money has found its way into schools. I regret that the Bill does not set out a way to ensure that the money that the Government provide, irrespective of party politics, finds its way into schools and not, perhaps, into some of the education authorities' favourite projects.

A long-running dispute between myself and Derbyshire county council involves the subsidy of school meals. The Under-Secretary of State answered one of my parliamentary questions only a few weeks ago. I asked the hon. Lady to provide a list of the amount of subsidy in the form of school meals that was given to the shire counties. It will not surprise the House to know, bearing in mind what I have just said, that, over 10 years, Derbyshire came top of the league in providing the greatest subsidy—and not by short measure, but by a huge amount.

From 1986-87 to 1995-96, Derbyshire provided a subsidy of about £150 million. Over the same period, the neighbouring authority of Staffordshire provided a subsidy of about £64 million. If an authority takes a decision to subsidise school meals, it can do so, but the money cannot be spent twice. If an authority decides to subsidise school meals, the money that is used for that purpose will not be available for education, and it will not be available for schools generally.

I am glad to say that it seems now that Derbyshire county council basically agrees with me. There has recently been industrial action between Unison and the council. The council has been trying to reduce the subsidy for school meals by about £2.6 million. For the first time in 11 years, some of the press releases issued by the county council could have been put out under my own name. One such press release reads:

[Mr. Patrick McLoughlin]

"Figures released by Unison show how much more efficient the Derbyshire service needs to become to bring it into line with services in other neighbouring counties. Last year Nottinghamshire spent £8.51 per head and Leicestershire £6.77 per head on their school meals services, compared with £12.78 per head in Derbyshire."

Councillor Wilcox, chairman of the education committee, said:

"What these figures actually demonstrate is the need for our service to become more efficient to protect the future of the service and to make it more attractive to parents and pupils."

The council has also been saying that if money is spent on subsidising school meals, that money will not be available for the education service within the county. I agree with that and I much regret that for 10 years we have had a sterile debate about the level of subsidies provided by the county council for school meals when that money should have been made available for the schools to reduce class sizes.

Unfortunately, because the county council wanted to make a political point, it continued with what I believe was an unrealistic subsidy. Finally, it is having to come to grips with reality. That led to industrial action taking place within the county, which is doing no one any good. It is not doing the school meals service any good, and it is not doing pupils' education any good.

Derbyshire has suffered because it provided a subsidy for school meals that was larger than that of any other shire county. The result has been a diminution of the quality of school buildings and an increase in class sizes. At the same time the council can go on only about the difference in spending and in allocation between Hertfordshire and Derbyshire.

In the past, I have supported the case for a review of the additional cost allowance. In that regard, I welcome the Government's undertaking. The previous Government initiated an independent review, and the result was a solution different from that which I wanted. We shall see in due course the Government's eventual solution to area cost adjustments. I understand from a recent parliamentary answer that it will be some time before the Government see area cost adjustments being changed in any way.

Derbyshire county council seems to rely on the difference in spending between it and Hertfordshire county council. That brings me to the annual capital allowances that were announced by the Government last week. The Minister of State sent us a letter which set out what the allowances would be. Even the new Government have given Hertfordshire about £7.2 million and Derbyshire about £5.8 million. We need to spend money on schools, on reducing class sizes and on ensuring that expansion takes place where it is necessary. There is no difference between any of us on those issues, but Derbyshire argued that it was treated unfairly by the previous Government. By the same token, it would seem that it has been treated unfairly by the Labour Government.

I am concerned about the future of grant-maintained schools, given the terms of the Bill. It is clear from the Bill that the Government are proposing to introduce foundation governors, who will come from the local education authorities, to sit on GM school boards. The Government seem to be forgetting some of the battles that they encouraged when in opposition between schools that wished to become grant maintained and those that did not. The Under-Secretary of State shakes her head—it would seem that she disagrees with me profoundly. Anyone who was an observer when schools were opting for GM status will be aware of what took place.

I understand that the Minister represents a Birmingham constituency. There were horrendous stories circulating in Birmingham about the lengths to which the authority was prepared to go to try to stop schools becoming grant maintained. There were similar stories about other authorities. It is thought now, however, that there will be sweetness and light and that no malice will be held by local education authorities although they have witnessed battles in the past. I do not believe that. On the contrary, I believe that there is a threat to the future and structure of GM schools.

I remember a school that became grant-maintained in my constituency. There was a large public meeting about a threat to its sixth form. One of the LEA governors said, "I believe that the school should retain its sixth form, but I have been appointed by the LEA and because the authority wants to close the sixth form, that is all right by me, and that is what I shall support." I see that the Government Deputy Chief Whip acknowledging that that is a policy which might find agreement in other areas, but I do not accept that that is the way forward for the structure and future of our schools.

A large education Bill is before us and I regret that Back-Bench Members have only a short time to discuss it. However, that is one of the factors of the parliamentary timetable. Like any large education measure, there are parts of it that are to be welcomed. Sadly, however, I believe that overall the Bill will lead to a diminution of education, especially within schools which have been brave enough to take the GM course. That is my regret.

Ms Margaret Hodge (Barking): I suppose that it is fitting, despite the invitations to be elsewhere, that our final debate before the Christmas recess should be on our first priority as a new Government. This allows us to end the calendar year where we started the new term—putting education at the heart of our agenda.

When I was preparing for the debate I looked back at the debate on Second Reading of the previous Government's last, dismal attempts to improve schools. Two issues dominated that debate, and both were irrelevant to the central problems facing us in British schools. First, there was the proposal, led by the then Prime Minister, to have a grammar school in every town, which meant that yet again we focused our energies on structures and not standards, on policies for the privileged few, not those for the nation's many, and on ideology-driven dogma instead of what works.

Secondly, there was the proposition that caning our children would improve discipline. It may be hard to believe that today, but we were having what purported to be a serious debate on education standards and Conservative Members believed that the answer was to legalise the whacking of children in schools. That was not said in a pre-Christmas haze of excess alcohol, nor was it proposed in a debate on April fool's day; although it seemed to be a poor rewrite of an Ealing studio comedy, it simply reflected the Conservative Government in their final hours—utterly bereft of any serious and sensible ideas.

The same attitude was evident when the present Bill was published and given its First Reading. There was obviously a great deal of public interest in the far-reaching proposals that it contained, but where were the Opposition? The shadow Secretary of State, who is not his place, had apparently retreated from Westminster to the country and his deputy refused to appear on several programmes because, apparently, she had not been briefed. Indeed, in one studio the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) and I were left with an empty chair for the Conservatives because they were unable to find anyone at all to comment on any of the proposals in the Bill. That says it all.

For my part, I believe that the Bill sets out the most radical yet practical agenda for education for a generation. In their first eight months, the Labour Government have produced a raft of measures that will help to create an age of achievement in Britain's schools. It is wonderful to see in the Bill proposals which really focus on education standards and recognise that education is central to our ability to deliver welfare reform and social cohesion—the Government's other two priorities. From nursery education to class sizes, from setting literacy and numeracy targets to introducing home-school contracts, from bringing in assessments for five-year-olds to value-added data on children and schools, from fast-track proposals for bright children to fresh-start proposals for failing schools, from homework and literacy clubs to repairing 10,000 schools by 2002, it is an ambitious programme designed to ensure that every child in every school gets the best opportunity to learn.

I want to comment on two specific proposals. First, the Bill will demand a complete rethink for local education authorities. I strongly support that. In the past, LEAs have intervened, often on a daily basis, in the detailed running of schools. The Bill demands that they change and recognise that the days of the all-powerful interfering LEA are over. LEAs have a new and different task which is vital to our purpose. They must become an integral part of the crusade to raise standards. [Interruption.] Obviously, Opposition Members do not understand the Bill.

By preparing an education development plan, LEAs will lead the local drive to promote school improvement. By monitoring schools, they will ensure that targets are met. Where schools are succeeding, LEAs must learn to take a back seat; where schools are failing, they must intervene swiftly and decisively.

All too often, the Opposition have criticised LEAs—and they are doing so again today—but in 18 years they did nothing to tackle their under-performance. The Bill contains clauses which show that the new Labour Government will not tolerate failing LEAs. However, I hope that LEAs will grasp their new role with enthusiasm and view it as an opportunity, not a threat. Indeed, some LEAs, such as Birmingham and Barking and Dagenham, have already begun to show the way. Steering schools to improve their performance rather than running services which schools themselves can run is an enormous challenge. It is a different role, not a diminished role—a crucial role, not a minor role.

There are those in right-wing think tanks who urge that we should abolish LEAs and run education from Whitehall. They are wrong. We cannot effectively run 24,000 schools from Sanctuary buildings, and if we ever abolished LEAs we would have to reinvent them in another guise. The centre will never have the capacity to monitor sufficiently or intervene appropriately at local level. I say that as a parent and politician whose children were educated mostly under the Inner London Education Authority. Even ILEA was too large and remote to step in early enough to prevent a problem from developing into a crisis in such schools as William Tyndale, Highbury Quadrant or Highbury Grove.

We need the democratic accountability of elected LEAs to provide the partnership, parental involvement and community and business commitment that will help to translate our policies into practice. So the task for Government is to encourage, cajole and insist that LEAs adapt to their new role. Local democracy is about empowering people, not politicians and for the LEA that means acting as the voice for parents and children—for the consumers and not the producers in the education system.

The second proposition on which I wish to comment is the education action zones. The proposals could revolutionise education in deprived and underperforming areas. Disadvantage cannot excuse failure in our schools or low attainment levels for some children, but equally we need to offer schools in deprived areas the means to tackle that disadvantage.

Unlike the Tories, we in the Labour party recognise the problems that social deprivation brings to education and we are committed to addressing them. I hope that the education action zones, with the freedoms that they gain and the resources that they attract, will become hotbeds of innovation and best practice.

Creating a formal structure around a family of schools is good in itself because it encourages sharing of good practice and helps provide the pressure and support to develop the good and deal with the poor. Creating formal partnerships between schools, parents, businesses and other local interests is also good in itself, because schools perform best with the support of their local communities, not detached from them. Releasing schools from some of the constraints in the national curriculum will ensure that literacy and numeracy become the fulcrum on which a broad and balanced curriculum must rest. Providing extra money will enable us to target resources where they are most needed.

Finally, I am delighted that the zones will be able to apply for exemption from teachers' statutory pay and conditions. The recent Select Committee report on teacher supply suggested a range of proposals to raise the quality and increase the number of teachers. Some involve rewarding teachers on performance mobility, not just length of service. We need to test those ideas.

Further, I have long argued that allowing a precious capital resource—our schools—to remain unused for a quarter of the year while teachers are exhausted by cramming too much into the teaching term and, during the long summer holidays, children who need to catch up and keep up with their peers forget what they have learnt, is nonsense. It is a relic of the days when children were expected to help with the harvest and mothers worked only in the home. I hope that experiments will take place in education action zones to challenge those outdated traditions.

The Bill represents a watershed in British education. It is about promoting what works and ensuring fairness. For 18 long years, parents, pupils and teachers have suffered from a penny-pinching dogma-driven attitude to Britain's schools. Now at last we have a Government who are committed to high standards for all, who rely on common sense and best practice for their policies and who really have made better education their No. 1 priority.

7.57 pm

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): It is a real pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge), and I congratulate her on a very fine speech. Having crossed swords with the hon. Lady many times when I was local government finance Minister and she was leading delegations to squeeze more money out of me, I must say that her raft of measures is drifting swiftly to the right. It is Christmas week, but her remarks sounded like an early leaked draft of the Queen's Speech. However, I am delighted that the hon. Lady feels that way. There is always room for her on the Opposition side if the Government do not give her a job.

I start by declaring an interest and making a confession. My interest is that I am an associate member of the Association of Teachers and Lecturers—an excellent organisation which I joined in 1967 when I was a professional teacher and continue to support. However, I should like to make it clear to the House that I pay it—it does not pay me.

My confession is that I have read the Bill from cover to cover. Last Thursday, I had occasion to travel on one of Mr. Richard Branson's excellent express trains to Preston and that provided me with a good opportunity to challenge the Bill. It took me the whole journey there to read it and most of the journey back to read the schedules. It was not a great read; nor is it a great Bill. It leaves out quite a lot. For example, it leaves out the whole vexed issue of school transport, which for most schools yields more grief than most educational topics with which schools have to cope. I regret that omission. As a former teacher of 16 years, I should like to be the first Member on either side of the House just to say thank you and a very happy Christmas to our teaching profession.

When I was on the Government Benches, I took years and years of stick from the Labour party because we Conservatives did not send our children to state schools and did not know what we were talking about. We heard that again tonight. It was a delight to hear the outburst of the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), which we know really represented what is in the hearts and minds of most Labour Members. We heard the same from the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones). I thought that when he said that Ministers had at last got schools by the throat, he was articulating something that is deeply felt by the Labour party.

Fifteen years ago, there was conflict between selective and non-selective schools in my constituency. My right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) showed clearly that that period of unhappy dissention has come to an end—certainly in my constituency, where there is huge strength in the diversity of schools. We have comprehensives with and without sixth forms, secondary moderns, special schools, hospital schools, grammar schools, independent schools and a further education college—and that is just for a population of about 100,000. I am proud to say that there are no bad schools in my constituency. I have no difficulty—indeed, I have great pride—in supporting them all.

The Government's blueprint for change is a bit of a curate's egg. The Bill could bring new vision and hope to children, parents and teachers, or it could bring with it an orgy of destruction and grief. The legislation will see the end of local independence for grant-maintained schools, such as Westwood St. Thomas in my constituency, which will be forced back under the county council from which it so recently escaped. I deplore the way in which Church schools will be treated. There will be no role in the hiring and firing of teachers for the diocesan director of education, and a reduction in the number of Church-appointed governors. On other issues, the Church schools are happier.

Through the Bill, new Labour is taking massive powers from local people and handing them to Ministers. The present Ministers are such very nice people. I worry very much about who will follow them. I have enjoyed much debate with the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Ms Morris), and her colleagues, and formerly with the Secretary of State on very important and fundamental local government issues, such as local government finance, the poll tax and the council tax. I worry about giving so much power to such very nice people, only to see in a year or two completely different people in their posts.

The Bill represents no new, open government. The future of our grammar schools, such as Bishop Wordsworth's school and South Wilts grammar school in my constituency, hang on the ballots of parents. The regulations on which parents may vote are still secret. Ministers must realise how easy it would be to rig the ballot in favour of abolition. I noticed that the Secretary of State mentioned that issue in his speech, and I noted carefully what he said. He referred to appropriate feeder and primary schools where 20 per cent. of relevant parents trigger a ballot.

What is an appropriate feeder school? Who are relevant parents? Those secrets will not do. We must know the exact detail before we can possibly support the measures, or we shall realise that they are just a cover-up for old Labour's antipathy towards grammar and grant-maintained schools. I challenge Ministers not just to try to put the clock back 18 years but to encourage exciting developments.

The variety of good schools in my constituency is remarkable. I hope that any new Act will build on it. Pride in the town of Amesbury is under stress, since all our sixth formers are having to leave their town for others for post-16 education. That is not of practical benefit to the community. When the pattern of local education was settled 15 or so years ago, the population of the town was never envisaged to be as great as it is now. It is not helpful to Amesbury and it is a disincentive to young people that post-16 education means trekking miles each day—and back again—up to Durrington, down to Salisbury or, indeed, out of the county.

Fashion in education changes, too. Fifteen years ago, the experts thought that 16-year-olds would grow up more quickly and better in colleges of further education. Today, parents usually prefer a school sixth form to provide a more appropriate atmosphere for learning and personal development. Parents in my constituency in Downton, Amesbury and much of Salisbury understand that very well. That is why I welcome and support moves by Wyvern boys technology college and St. Edmund's secondary modern for girls on the Laverstock site to explore the opportunity of a new joint sixth form. I look forward to the arrival of the Wyvern baccalaureate—approved by the university of Bath.

Such a joint sixth form would pose no threat to existing schools. It would mean changes for Salisbury college, but it is doing extremely well at expanding further education and its franchised degree courses. It has opted to change its own character and realises that other educational establishments will change theirs. Will Ministers tell me whether the sort of changes that I have described will be encouraged by the Bill?

Schedule 17 deals with the staffing of voluntary-aided schools. It is a very long schedule of 24 paragraphs—although not as long as schedule 28, which has 146 paragraphs. There are 30 schedules, 130 pages of small print and a fistfuls of blank cheques.

I know that the Church of England is disappointed that the measure introduced in 1991 concerning the diocesan board of education is not reinforced by or incorporated in the Bill. That measure requires that, in a Church of England voluntary-aided school, the chief education officer of the local education authority and the diocesan director of education should have the same rights. Personally, I should have preferred those rights to apply to voluntary-controlled schools as well.

Paragraph 2 of schedule 17 provides that the governing body may agree with the LEA to accord advisory rights to the chief education officer in the engagement or dismissal of teachers—but if the governors do not agree, the Secretary of State can overrule them anyway under the joyous situation that we are about to see unfold. Paragraph 2(7) explains that the chief education officer includes "any officer of the authority nominated by the chief education officer."

The poor old diocesan director is still left out. The Bill recognises neither the rights nor the responsibilities of diocesan directors of education. That is not acceptable, and I ask Ministers to amend schedule 17 in Committee to put that right in the interests of building a partnership with Church schools.

Similarly, I hope that Ministers will consider again the role of governors in schools where a diocesan board of education had a majority of appointments of foundation governors, which will be forced to abandon GM status and become new foundation schools, and where the Church will have only a minority of appointments to the same school, serving the same community.

Will the Minister reveal the identity of the spectre at the feast who appears briefly in schedule 9? In the explanatory memorandum, we are told in chapter III—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member has had his 10 minutes.

8.7 pm

Mr. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford): Like my hon. Friends, I welcome the Bill's Second Reading.

Also like many of my hon. Friends, during the summer recess, I had the opportunity to bring together teachers, governors and representatives of the education department in my constituency to discuss the White Paper "Excellence in Schools". I was—as I always am—struck by their dedication and commitment, their enthusiasm for the legislation and the White Paper, and their remarks about improving standards in education.

It is vital that we continue to listen, co-operate and understand the realities of teaching in the late 1990s. There can be no doubt that, in certain areas, teachers do one of the most difficult jobs. They face many demands from every quarter—from children, parents, governors, local education authorities, employers, colleges and universities. Not least, and rightly, there are demands from the Government—because education is our No. 1 priority. All of us are reliant on having good teachers, and that is what the majority are. At the meetings that I have organised, the new, clear and accountable role of the LEA in raising standards was welcomed. The education officers in my constituency see their role as a positive partnership with schools, not one of unnecessary interference, as was alleged earlier.

I can understand why some of the grant-maintained schools in my constituency have some anxiety about re-establishing their relationship with the LEA. However, the fact that LEAs will be subject to rigorous inspections, as schools are, will be welcome and will perhaps alleviate some of the anxiety. Time will tell.

It is right that schools should have autonomy and be able to develop their personalities and aspirations. However, they should not be isolated from the rest of the education community in their area. All schools have to be involved if we are to develop the most effective education development plans and to ensure that we maximise resources. By resources, I mean knowledge and not just finance. An example of that is promoting and sharing best practice and exchanging information about home-school contracts.

During the meetings that I organised, the issue of home-school contracts prompted much debate. For many schools, they are a straightforward exercise involving co-operative parents and well-behaved children. For other schools, home-school contracts mean expending considerable effort and energy. If home-school contracts are to be worth while, they must be more than just a paper exercise. The piece of paper is secondary: the most important requirement is the relationship, and developing a positive relationship with some parents is not always easy. Getting them to take an active interest in their child's education in school can appear damned near impossible.

However, those parents often have the children with the greatest needs; indeed, the children's needs can be so great because of their parents. It can be done, and the school of which I am proud to be a governor—Wayfield primary in Chatham—sees the developing of two-way responsibility between parents and school as the key to continuing its improvement. Getting home-school contracts right and developing the relationships will have many rewards and help to tackle the problems about which we have heard, such as deprivation and bad behaviour.

In Kent, we face particular challenges in improving education standards for all children. Historically, the county has been underfunded, despite its relative wealth—contrary to what the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) said—and that has been well recorded and recognised. For decades, Kent has been one of the lowest investors in education. For example, between 1991 and 1993, Conservative Kent robbed schools of £80 million. It underspent its education standard spending assessment by £53.2 million between 1991 and 1992 and by £29.7 million between 1992 and 1993, at a time when schools were crumbling and the school repair bill in Kent totalled £75 million. Worse still, children with special educational needs had to wait four years for their statements to be produced.

Fortunately, a sea change occurred. Under the stewardship of my colleague, Joyce Esterson, the co-chair of education, Kent received a much-needed boost. Between 1993 and 1997, the administration, like the Government, placed education at the top of its priorities. It improved standards and resources and, importantly, developed a working partnership with the teaching profession that did not previously exist. Gone were outside toilets, down to six months went the wait for special education needs statements, and the first nursery classes were built in Kent since the previous Labour Government's urban aid programme. I am proud to say that one of those nurseries was built in my constituency, in Chatham.

We also saw the introduction of the children's university, an innovative practice which opened schools on Saturday mornings to those children who needed extra tuition. That boost was achieved by parents, teachers and the LEA working together. I am pleased to say that the new Tory administration in Kent will continue the improvements laid down in previous years and has pledged to fund education fully, up to its SSA. Unfortunately, it now appears that the administration will charge for the children's university. That is to be regretted because it may exclude children from poorer families.

Kent faces a further significant challenge if it is to achieve the education system it wants. In Kent, we have 40 of the 163 11-plus selective grammar schools, which provide excellent education for 30 per cent. of Kent children. The vast majority of the rest go to secondary moderns. I welcome the opportunity that the ballots will provide to have a real debate about how we can ensure the best education system in Kent for all children. My position is clear: I want Kent to develop a modern comprehensive system, but that will be for parents to decide. I believe that all parents with children of statutory school age should have the right to decide, and I look forward to the comments of my hon. Friend the Minister on that point.

Why do I believe that a modern comprehensive system would be best for Kent children? The argument is not about ideology but about outcomes. The figures are alarming. When one compares Kent, which is a reasonably affluent area, with other areas, the figures do not make sense. In Kent, we have four out of the 20 of the lowest achieving schools, in A to C grades, in the country. We have the school with the lowest exam results in the country, despite that school having receiving a very good Ofsted report. In Kent, 42 schools have lower exam results than the lowest scorer in East Sussex. In Kent, 17 schools have lower exam results than the lowest scorer in Tower Hamlets, where 90 per cent. of pupils have English as a second language. In Kent, we have 24 schools that have lower exam results than the lowest performer in Wales. What makes Kent different? Selection.

Imagine how difficult it is in secondary moderns, as a pupil who has failed the 11-plus and where 50 or even 60 per cent. of children in a class have special educational needs. That is simply not fair, although the work and the effort that teachers in those schools put in should be applauded—I certainly applaud them.

Exam results are not the only issue. Funding is also important. The grammar schools have large sixth forms and, therefore, extra money and better facilities. Within a mile of my constituency, there is a grammar school with excellent facilities and superb buildings, yet just down the road there is another school with its paint peeling off and its bricks crumbling. That is inequality, and it is a disgrace that cannot continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has had his 10 minutes.

8.17 pm

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): The Bill has been flagged by the Government as a significant event for Wales. The separate education White Paper for Wales was entitled "Building Excellent Schools Together". I think that the word "together" was supposed to convey something about the special circumstances of Wales.

The Bill is also the first major measure since the devolution referendum on an area of policy that falls within the responsibilities of the Secretary of State for Wales and will therefore be the responsibility of the national Assembly of Wales, which will be up and running in just over 18 months. The purpose of the Assembly, beyond the primary function of asserting and expressing constitutionally the national status of Wales for the first time in 600 years, is to enable the development of policies appropriate to Wales, springing from Welsh values and realities and geared to achieving success for Wales.

The Bill will progress through the House at the same time as the Bill to establish the national Assembly for Wales. The Secretary of State for Wales, in his preface to the White Paper on devolution, referred to schools as a particular example of the way in which the Assembly would enable the people of Wales to pursue their priorities.

At Welsh questions, I asked the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Hain)—the Minister responsible for education in Wales—whether he thought that the Assembly would have powers to implement policy measures in education that would be distinctive for Wales. He responded positively, and claimed that it would. The problem is that the Assembly will have no primary legislative powers and, for a national Assembly, that is a grievous deficiency—to put it mildly. Labour Members have asserted that that is not an insuperable problem because primary legislation can be designed to give scope for action through the secondary legislative powers which the Assembly will have. There has been much talk about Henry VIII-style legislation and the scope that that provides.

I wanted to see what provision there was in the Bill for distinctive policies relevant to Wales to be developed by the Assembly which, as I have said, will be up and running in 18 months. I was not much encouraged by what the Secretary of State for Education and Employment said [illegible] to my intervention. He suggested that there would be scope for variation, but that it would have to be within the principles in the Bill. I do not like all those principles.

For the reasons I have mentioned, the Bill is a significant event for Wales, but I cannot see all that much relevance in it. I cannot see that it will enable us to design the policies that I want to see implemented in Wales. I am not sure whether the irrelevance of the Bill is a matter of design or a matter of default. Having studied it carefully, I am not all that much the wiser.

It cannot be only I who am none the wiser, because the Library's briefing paper does not provide much help. I was hoping for assistance from the Library in understanding the implications of clause 118(6), which says:

"Any order or regulations under this Act may make different provision in relation to England and Wales respectively."

However, the Library briefing stops abruptly at clause 117—obviously, it did not feel like tackling the issue.

I am unclear on the extent to which the Bill will facilitate or frustrate the crucial task of building excellent schools together, as the Welsh White Paper puts it. I am unsure, but, from what I have seen, I am sceptical. There is one welcome exception: the provision in clauses 112 and 113 to foster a collaborative initiative in Wales between further education colleges and schools in providing post-16 education. That is a welcome response to the findings of the Select Committee report on further education in Wales, with which I was proud to be associated.

The measure should provide a starting point to enable the national Assembly to move towards an integrated comprehensive tertiary system—the kind of system that would be cost-efficient and would eliminate the wasteful duplication we see in post-16 education in Wales. It will provide a real choice for students in a wide range of subject areas, both vocational and academic, and would enable the combination of the two.

I hope that we are able to move quickly towards the implementation and the adoption of the Welsh bac—the Welsh baccalaureate—as the main post-16 qualification in Wales. I was disappointed by the Welsh Office's refusal to fund a pilot for the Welsh bac. That sprung, I am afraid, from the terror of doing things differently in Wales from what happens in England. I am confident that the Assembly will not make the same mistake.

There is much that is good in the Bill, but I am afraid that there is much that gives profound concern as well. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] There is far too much accommodation of the agenda and obsessions of the previous Government; the agreement that I received from Conservative Members shows that they are not in tune with my reservations.

The previous Government clearly saw the competitive market as the engine for driving up standards. Not only would schools compete for pupils, but pupils would compete for places in schools. Schools performance tables—league tables, as they are called—are only an instrument to enable parents to participate in that competitive market. They were accompanied by the aggressive rhetoric sometimes associated with the private sector and competition, especially in relation to teachers' performance.

The Government have reined in all of that and modified the approach, but too much remains. As for aggressive [illegible]

What is the difference, I ask myself, between zero tolerance and intolerance? I do not like to see the naming and shaming of schools, as that is not the way to tackle the real problems.

As well as the emphasis on pupils' preferences, the Bill gives far too much credence to selection. The Bill protects, rather than attacks, grammar schools—despite what some Tories have said—and will allow them to expand. It will allow other selective schools to continue to select on the basis of ability. Clause 93 proposes to allow selection by ability to be increased through the back door. It uses the term "aptitude", but aptitude on one or more subjects is a pretty good indicator of general ability. It is not a perfect indicator, but any teacher will know that it is a good one.

The measure has been introduced in the name of specialism—that is its justification. We are told that this is at the heart of the Secretary of State's and the Government's vision of the education system. Education will cater for the individual strengths of a child rather than assuming a bland sameness for all. If the Government are serious about avoiding a bland sameness, I suggest that they listen carefully to the proposals of the Third Sector Schools Alliance to allow schools with alternative curricula, such as Muslim schools, to come into the maintained sector.

I am dubious about the idea of specialist schools. Pupils need a first-rate general education, with the variations that one gets between schools. The idea of selecting pupils for hot-house treatment in PE or music is rather manipulative and disturbing. However, I am more worried by the credibility that the Bill gives to the principle of selection by ability. It is true that it is limited to 10 per cent., but it is establishing the principle of selection, and it makes it easier for a future Government to expand the principle. I do not necessarily mean a Conservative Government, or a Government not led by the present Prime Minister. The Labour Government, under this Prime Minister, are capable of extending the principle—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to speak. While offering—the House will not be surprised to hear—my wholehearted support for and endorsement of the Government for the Bill, it is important to remind the House of the historical context of the Bill, which makes its production after such a short period so impressive.

During the past 50 years, the schools system has suffered from some of the most horrendous swings. In the 1950s, we had rote learning and the approach of the "sheep and goats" tendency parodied by, among others, Dennis Potter—when a teacher said, "Good morning," all the pupils wrote it down. We then had the 1960s and 1970s. There were many good things in that period, such as the creative originality and expression that were given rein in schools, but damaging pseudo-educational theories were also perpetrated. This Government are determined to repair the resultant damage and chaos caused to literacy

[Mr. Gordon Marsden]

We then had the Tory Administration, with their emphasis on dogma. In the 1980s, there were times when I thought that the Tory party had gone Maoist, so committed was it to the doctrine of permanent revolution. Now, we have an opportunity to put all that behind us.

My right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench have rightly produced a Bill that puts the emphasis on standards and not on structures. What concerns all hon. Members is how the Bill will be judged in our constituencies and how it will affect schools there. Many of our constituencies have an enormous variety of social circumstances and schools. That is one reason the provision of education action zones in smaller areas than the traditional local education authority areas is so important.

In the central area of my constituency, conditions mimic those of the inner city—60 to 65 per cent. of children have free school meals, classes are large, conditions are often cramped and do not permit expansion, and many children are from bed-and-breakfast backgrounds.

Earlier this year, with our shadow Health spokesperson—now my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport—I visited a nursery in the constituency that I was hoping to gain. We spoke to the people responsible for the three and four-year-olds before they went on to school and were told that one of their most important tasks was to teach table manners. We asked what they meant. They told us that they had to teach children how to sit at table and use a knife and fork because many of them spent their time sitting on the edge of a bed eating takeaways and did not know how to use a knife and fork or a plate properly. That is the social context in which the early years forum, which is presaged by the Bill, is so important. It is also the social context in which literacy schemes aimed at both the adult population and children are so important, and it is one reason I commend the Bill so warmly.

Hon. Members have heard that there was a tremendous response to the consultation process on the White Paper. My constituency was no exception. I called a meeting, which was attended by more than 80 school governors, chairs and teachers, and we had a good discussion. Most of the principles of the Bill are based on the White Paper. I have here a little extract from one of the comments. Some hon. Members have commented on the voluntary sector. A voluntary-aided comprehensive school in my constituency says that the White Paper

"is ambitious and encouraging. It has a coherence to it and is based on the principles and practices which underpin the education service. For the first time in many years, a Government document gets to the roots of what is important in education and in the raising of standards."

That is why I was saddened at the shadow Secretary of State's curmudgeonly approach to the White Paper and to the value of education action zones. Were it not for the fact that his rhetoric descended on us with all the impact of a slap in the face with a wet kipper, it would have been particularly unfortunate and unpleasant, because the education action zones will hit many of the buttons that must be pressed in 1990s education. They will allow flexibility and the involvement of many agencies and will break down the disastrous divorce between private and public education. They will show the importance of early-years education and bring in youth workers and local business

Echoing the thoughts expressed by other hon. Members this evening, I hope that as many education authorities and sub-authorities as possible will apply to be education action zones. They are not something to be aimed merely at failing schools and standards.

The Bill will be judged on the hope that it brings to individual schools. About a month ago, I presented prizes at a high school in my constituency. It is a community school, with 400 or 500 pupils drawn mainly from the local estates. When we debate the Bill in more detail, the importance of school size and its relevance to teaching techniques will become increasingly apparent.

The school does not have the best GCSE results in Blackpool, but it has an enormous sense of community spirit. Frankly, in some respects the teaching is old-fashioned, and it is none the worse for that. The pride of the teachers, pupils and parents comes across. In music and sport, for example, the school does much better than average, and those are the sort of things that will be recognised as a result of the Bill and the education action zones, as well as our well-heralded priorities on literacy and numeracy.

At the prize giving, I had to come up with the old clichés about what one says on such occasions. I mentioned my school motto—it is in Latin, as I am afraid that I went to one of those old-fashioned schools—"Vincit qui patitur". I explained that it was technically, "He conquers who endures", or "He conquers who suffers" and said that another way to look at it was, "You will get there if you stick at it." Getting there if you stick at it is at the heart of the Bill.

As a Government, we are not trying to reinvent the wheel or to block out everything that has happened in the past 20 to 30 years. We are trying to make a systematic impact on society and to tackle all the various problems with an holistic approach. That is why the Bill and the concept of education action zones are so important, and why I am delighted to commend the Bill to the House.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): I found much in the speech of the hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Mr. Marsden) with which I was able to agree, in particular most of his remarks about education action zones, but I feel that we have had something of a Jekyll and Hyde act from Labour Back Benchers and, indeed, the Government.

We have had "A Christmas Carol" of sorts; the Secretary of State and Labour Members denounced every educational initiative of the 1980s, but they seem to have been changed beyond all recognition, presumably by sympathetic hauntings from the benevolent spirits of Lord Joseph and Lord Baker. They now come before us ready to accept the system of testing, independent inspection and league tables that they resisted with their utmost energy and vigour when they were on the Opposition Benches and Conservative Ministers were taking the measures through the House.

While Conservative Members, following the lead of my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell), welcome that conversion and the emphasis, or at least the rhetorical emphasis, that the Secretary of State placed on the need to drive up school standards, we also remain united in our opposition to those parts of the Bill that seek content with mediocrity, but to pull down and destroy schools that are achieving on behalf of pupils they exist to serve. My right hon. Friend referred to the way in which grant-maintained schools, whose independence the Bill would extinguish, have succeeded in improving standards and acting as catalysts for innovation and greater diversity within the maintained system of education.

In Buckinghamshire, we have the only local education authority with an entirely selective secondary education system. It is not simply an accident that, this year, Buckinghamshire has also produced the best GCSE results of any local education authority.

Mr. Brady: My local authority—Trafford—is also entirely selective, and we can compete in having the best A-level results in the country.

Mr. Lidington: I am delighted that we can engage in this friendly competition. Of course, my hon. Friend has to contend with a Labour party in Trafford that is, sadly, committed to destroying those schools and the success to which he referred.

In Buckinghamshire, not only the grammar schools, such as Aylesbury high school, Aylesbury grammar school and Sir Henry Floyd grammar school, are achieving high standards. As Labour and Opposition Members have said today, we live in an educational world that can accommodate diversity and in which there is a growing recognition that schools of different characters can exist side by side, each pursuing excellence in its own sphere.

One need only look at some of the non-selective upper schools in my constituency or elsewhere in Buckinghamshire, such as the Misbourne school in Great Missenden or Holmer Green upper school in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), which was singled out by the chief inspector in his published list of the most successful schools in the country, to see that dedicated governors and teachers, with the support of parents, can succeed and put to rest the myth that a selective system can succeed only by favouring the few at the expense of the many.

I hope that, if the Government, as I fear they will, insist on including the clauses that aim at the extinction of selective grammar schools, they will at least comply with the request of my right hon. Friend the Member for Charnwood to publish, at an early stage of our proceedings in Committee, the draft regulations that are to govern the operation of grammar school ballots. We need to know exactly which parents are to be eligible to take part.

I welcome what has been said about the 20 per cent. trigger for such a ballot and the recognition in the Bill that circumstances may differ between some authorities; a ballot for a particular school may be appropriate in some circumstances and in others a ballot covering the entire LEA might be better.

I hope that the Minister for School Standards, either today or when he publishes the draft regulations, will explain the Government's view on the possibility of a moratorium after a ballot. It would be regrettable if, once a ballot had settled matters and parents had decided to retain grammar schools, there were to be a further period of uncertainty, lasting possibly for many years, as one

Other parts of the Bill also cause me concern. As well as publishing the draft regulations on grammar school ballots, I hope that the Government will not delay long in issuing the draft code on admissions policy that the Secretary of State proposes to publish. The policy proposed in the Bill would give much greater control to the Secretary of State over the policies of individual governing bodies and local education authorities.

As I understand the Bill, admissions procedures would have to be drawn up by the relevant admission authority—either the LEA or a governing body—and that, if that admission authority was a governing body, it would have to consult not only its own LEA but all other admission authorities for all other maintained schools in the relevant area. It would fall to the Secretary of State to define the relevant area; as the Bill stands, the term could apply to an area greater or smaller than an individual LEA. The Government owe it to the House to allow those matters to be explored adequately in Committee.

The Bill refers to appeals being made to an adjudicator. I would like to know more about that official's function, his terms of reference and whether his decisions would be subject to judicial review by the courts. The adjudicator himself could refer to the Secretary of State.

How would the admissions policy proposed in the Bill interact with the Government's policy on class sizes? There are only two ways in which it seems to me to be possible for the Government to meet their targets on class sizes: the first is to find from some source or other large additional resources to pay for the employment of teachers and teaching assistants. I have seen nothing in the figures that the Government have published so far—this is about the only matter on which I agree with the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster)—to suggest that they have the money in the kitty to fund such additional appointments; the second is to insist, through a strict admissions policy and a limit on appeals, that more children attend schools to which their parents do not want to send them. The Bill will severely restrict parental rights of appeal.

The hon. Member for Bath and my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) referred to the problem of the 31st child, as identified by the Local Government Association. What happens in a school that serves a small town or village in a rural area? Is that child to be bussed many miles to a different school far from home? Are brothers and sisters to be split up because they fall foul of the arbitrary ceiling that the Government want to impose?

Are we in danger of getting into a system in which children whose birthdays happen to fall late in the academic year cannot get into the school near home or the school of their parents' choice simply because all the places up to the prescribed limit have been filled by the children who are lucky enough to have been born earlier? That strikes me as unfair.

I hope that the Minister will answer those detailed points, either today or in Committee.

8.46 pm

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West): I support the Bill in general and especially the education action zones, linked as they are to the concepts of innovation and raising standards. There is widespread support for them, and I

[Valerie Davey]

Foster) commenting enthusiastically and amazed to hear the Secretary of State adding his support—a conversion, I feel, from the dogma of competition to that of co-operation. [HON. MEMBERS: "Shadow."] Thank you. I meant the shadow Secretary of State.

There is also varied support outside the House. The National Association of Head Teachers regards the zones as "an exciting concept that could have a dramatic impact on progress towards achieving national targets" and Third Sector Schools Alliance says that the zones have the potential to enable radical measures to be tested. The basic concept is not new: groups of schools in all parts of the country that have sought, despite the divisive competition promoted by the previous Government, to work together, will welcome the proposals.

We welcome the proposals because they are based on collaboration, which brings the more efficient use of resources, including staff; the sharing of new ideas in the school community and beyond; the ability to attract the interest of commerce, industry and other partners; and a widening of links within education, from pre-school to post-retirement.

Young people in the education action zones will see the widening partnership and will see themselves within it as part of those communities. Previously, such groups, clusters and federations had only their innate good sense to support them against the hostile and divisive policies of the previous Government.

I want to consider briefly a federation that started in south Bristol in the mid-1980s. Five, and later six, secondary schools, which had been denied a tertiary college by the previous Government, came together of their own volition with their local further education college mutually to support the young people of the area. There was joint funding for someone to co-ordinate the federation. That person soon became an advocate and gained a high profile, and high-profile sponsorship, not only for individual pupils but for events and for longer-term projects. The staff came together across subjects, school age groups and sectors for local training. They came together to share ideas.

It was not long before the children of south Bristol were getting a better deal. We could see the beginnings of an improvement in their school standards. It was slowed down, and finally stopped, by the incorporation of the further education college and the reduced funding for schools in the punitive local management of schools system that so emphasised the need to increase pupil numbers.

We are therefore considering a system that has already been tried and that, under this Bill, would go even further. The proposals will not only bring together the groups that the south Bristol federation attempted to unite; in the action zones, members from local communities, business, industry and the voluntary sector would come together to support schools. There would also be a wider age spectrum. Parents would be attracted to further community education. As they got involved in education, lifelong learning would become a reality.

I want schools in the action zones to benefit from the support of the community. I want the concept to lead to two-way process, especially if we can link the zones with the new health zones and the improvements in employment projects. The whole concept is inspiring, and I fully recommend it.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): Having spent the past 34 years in teaching in the maintained sector, I was disappointed by the carping criticism of Conservative Members. They fail to understand that the vast majority of schools, teaching organisations, governors, parents and teachers want an end to conflict in our schools. All of them welcome the Bill. That is why I welcome the requirement for local education authorities to raise standards and the fact that they will be held accountable for that duty. They can discharge it only in partnership with teachers, governors, parents and Government. Too often in my lifetime in education, we have seen conflict, not partnership, between those sectors. Let us not forget that that conflict was as fierce before 1979 as it has been since.

There are dangers in giving LEAs a central role in the drive to raise standards. Some already see the Bill as a green light to reimpose the era of control, this time based not on the argument of local democracy but on the slogans of standards. If we are to achieve what I believe the Government want from the Bill, and what we certainly want, the need to clarify the powers of LEAs is paramount.

Liberal Democrats have argued for light-touch LEAs. We realise the need for a framework to assist with admissions, the provision of school places, the support of major capital funding and the provision of advisory and support services., but it is not the LEAs' responsibility to monitor and judge teaching and learning. They must not be encouraged by the Bill to develop unfettered powers of intervention. The best relationships will be those where LEAs, such as North Yorkshire, are invited to support, not those that make schools offers they cannot refuse.

In Committee, we shall seek to establish in what circumstances LEAs should intervene in schools and whether schools have the right of appeal. If the Bill allows an interventionist or empire-building LEA to intervene at any stage at which it can identify a management issue in a school, we could be catapulted back into the 1970s. That would undermine the principle of partnership between schools and the LEA and the relationship between the governing body and the school. We shall seek from the Secretary of State a commitment to a statutory code of practice to clarify the powers of LEAs to intervene in schools so that the balance of partnership is maintained.

Like other hon. Members, I warmly welcome the Government's commitment to early-years education. The requirement for LEAs to draw up in partnership with recognised providers an early-years development plan is an excellent start, but the Government lack courage and vision in what is surely the most crucial area if we are to raise standards in all our schools. We recognise that, once the Chancellor of the Exchequer had adopted the seasonal character of Scrooge rather than Santa Claus on 2 May, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment was unlikely to look further than four-year-olds in considering early-years education. We understand his difficult position nothing, but he knows only too well that providing places for four-year-olds will in itself do little to resolve the need for early-years education, and very little to expand provision.

Rather than improve provision, the previous Administration's vouchers-for-votes fiasco did the opposite. In the past year, 800 community-based pre-schools have closed and a further 1,500 are threatened with closure, almost entirely as a result of young children being admitted to schools shortly after their fourth birthday. In some authorities, there has been a near collapse of nursery school provision. The Government's proposals will do nothing to halt that trend, because many private sector providers can cannot survive on providing places for three-year-olds.

More worrying is the Secretary of State's lack of understanding of the nature of provision for three and four-year-olds. He rightly says that he wants quality provision for four-year-olds, but the reality is that more and more four-year-olds are being educated in reception classes. There are sound reasons for educating three and four-year-olds together, independently of children in reception classes. I trust that the Secretary of State will give a firm, timetabled commitment to phase in provision for three and four-year-olds, at least over the lifetime of this Parliament.

The Secretary of State must be aware that he cannot simply expand early-years education in isolation from a comprehensive child care strategy. We will therefore seek his support to make it a duty for LEAs to produce, with other public and private sector partners, a comprehensive plan to provide integrated child care and early-years education for children below statutory school age. Several of the Government's proposals for this Parliament depend on providing comprehensive education and care for under-fives. The new deal, welfare to work, nursery education, raising education standards, and even the benefit reductions for lone parents, are not stand-alone initiatives but part of the solution to the same problem: how do we in Britain in the 1990s create an inclusive society after years of division?

I must say to the Secretary of State that, unless we comprehensively address the need for child care provision and quality early years education as the foundation for raising standards, the rest of his Bill might just as well be shelved.

That leads me to an unfortunate omission from the Bill—reference to special education needs. The Secretary of State has produced an excellent White Paper, entitled "Excellence in schools", and it was pleasing to note the generous support it received when it was debated in the House a couple of weeks ago. Is the Secretary of State seriously suggesting, however, that a Bill to improve standards can be devoid of any reference to special education needs? The Liberal Democrats are committed to seeing our education system become a truly inclusive one, yet there remains a looseness surrounding the need to include children with special needs in mainstream education.

No doubt the Secretary of State will say that there is already adequate legislation on children with special needs in the Education Acts 1981, 1993 and 1996. After all, the 1981 Act directed LEAs to place all pupils in mainstream schools, but there were some important caveats. That was to be done provided it was compatible "receiving the special educational provision that he requires . . . the provision of efficient education for the children with whom he will be educated; and . . . the efficient use of resources."

In reality, those opt-out clauses gave sufficient scope for schools and some LEAs to refuse parental requests for mainstream provision for children with special needs.

I have been involved with the inclusion of children with special needs for more than 20 years. In Cleveland, we successfully integrated more than 90 per cent. of children at secondary age who had severe physical disabilities. That approach, which was championed by the Pocklington-Hegarty National Foundation for Educational Research study, has been replicated in almost all LEAs today. For the past 14 years in Leeds, I have had the privilege of being part of a major project to integrate children with severe learning difficulties, mostly children with Down's syndrome. Today, 80 per cent. of such children in Leeds are educated in mainstream schools.

The inclusive provision is, however, a lottery and whether a child receives education alongside his or her peers should not depend on where they live or who the head and the governors are. It should be a right and such provision should be made in the Bill. We will propose a new clause to the Bill that would make it a requirement for LEAs to enshrine the principle of inclusive education in their development plans.

Although the Government should be rightly commended for introducing the Bill, there is still much work to be done. For our part, we will work with the Government to clarify and improve the Bill. I trust that the Secretary of State will be open to our suggestions.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): I am most grateful to have the chance to participate in this debate because education and school standards are key issues for my constituency.

One of the advantages of speaking late in the debate is that one can sit and listen to everything that is said by the Opposition. By and large, their contributions have been marked by two things. First, they have talked endlessly about divisiveness and structures. We have heard a great deal from them about selection, grant-maintained schools, assisted places and the independent sector. In fact, they have shown every sign of wanting the divisiveness and conflict which so marred discussion of education in the late 1980s and early 1990s to continue.

The second matter about which Opposition Members have spoken endlessly is privilege and how to ensure that quality education is retained as a privilege for the few and not made a right for the majority of children.

The Bill sets out a framework that will get away from the conflict that caused so many problems in our education service in the late 1980s and early 1990s. It sets out the framework in which everyone who is involved in the education service can work in partnership. That partnership, which will involve different types of schools, including grant-maintained and even independent schools, as well as local education authorities and the community, including the business community, will operate for the benefit of children.

The Bill comes after exhaustive consultation in which all those partners and more looked in detail at how they

[Ms Sally Keeble]

They considered why children across the range of abilities do better in some schools than in others; what makes a good school; and the best practice that enables children to achieve. They also studied how to extend that best practice so that all children get the best added value out of their schooling.

Those considerations lead to the second aim of the Bill, which is to extend such educational advantages to all children. One of the most dramatic measures in the Bill, and probably one of the most difficult to achieve, is that designed to lower class sizes for children in those early years. Let me cite an example of the way in which that change will transform children's expectations at school. In my LEA in Northamptonshire about 3,000 children in early years education are taught in classes of more than 30. They will see the benefits of the Bill. It is worth noting that the assisted places scheme in Northamptonshire benefits just 253 children, at a cost of £949,000, which is enough to employ upwards of 50 teachers. I have no doubt where the public would rather see that sum of close on £1 million spent.

We have also heard the Opposition talk critically about some of the specific practice measures in the Bill, and I shall single out one: home-school contracts. They are extremely important and, in a certain sense, they fill one of the missing links in the education service. Where there is real disadvantage—I speak as a former leader of Southwark council where many of the children were extremely disadvantaged—one characteristic is that parents are frequently not involved in the school, or are hostile to it. Getting individual parents involved in their children's education will be a key element.

I wish to deal with two points of advantage and disadvantage. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce) is shouting, "Cheltenham, Cheltenham, Cheltenham." I shall take him on, because I think that all three of us ex-Cheltenham ladies prove that, if a child with reasonable ability is placed in a school with small class sizes, well qualified teachers, good books, good equipment and lots of educational opportunities, he or she will obtain good exam results. That says nothing about the educational achievements of schools; all it tells us is how rich the parents are and how money could buy privilege in Tory Britain. The hon. Gentleman should not throw Cheltenham at me.

A further point relating to disadvantage perhaps applies particularly to Opposition Members. The pattern of disadvantage is changing. When I was at school, people used to talk about improving girls' achievements; now, a much bigger problem is what to do about under-achieving boys. In Northamptonshire in 1977, at key stage 1, in reading and writing, 85 per cent. of girls reached the expected levels, but only 76 per cent. of boys; at key stage 2, the figures were 66 per cent. for girls and 51 per cent. for boys; at GCSE, 46.9 per cent. of girls obtained five or more GCSE grades A to C and only 34.8 per cent. of boys achieved the same results. That is a growing problem that schools will have to address; perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards will say something about that when he replies.

I welcome the consensual tone of the Bill. I welcome the fact that we have allowed for the diversity in the school structure that will enable all schools, including maintain a role and to make a contribution to children's achievement. I welcome the obligation to provide school meals. When Northamptonshire was under Conservative control, the Conservatives scrapped the school meals service. As well as disadvantaging children who came from poor homes, the policy was bitterly resented by working mothers.

I also welcome the recognition that there must be a proper role for the local education authority. Above all, I welcome the improvement in achievement and school performance which I believe that the Bill will bring for our school children in the future.

9.7 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): I am sure that, given her personal experience, the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) will agree that, while resources are vital, ethos is perhaps even more important. That is why I want to direct my few remarks to one type of school: Church schools. I do so not because I am an education specialist, but because I have personal experience.

Two of my children attend a grant-maintained, state, Church primary school. Since they have been attending the school—which is housed in one of those grim, five or six-storey Victorian buildings which one sees in inner cities—I have been enormously impressed by the education that they are receiving in a grant-maintained Church school. I only wish to plead with both sides of the House in a non-party-political way to try to further the cause of those excellent schools, many of which are in inner-city areas.

The school which my children attend has the most extraordinary social mix of pupils, all of whom, whatever their background, receive a first-rate education.

Why is that? Sometimes, education spokesmen—not only Government spokesmen, but others as well— seem to be obsessed with academic standards. The philosophy contained in the White Paper and in others I have read over the years is one of "I learn, therefore I am," or even, "I perform, therefore I am," rather than one of trying to educate the whole person. We all have our personal pet theories about what is the real crisis in the classroom, or even whether there is such a crisis, but I believe that real the crisis in the classroom is a spiritual one—a crisis of meaning.

Research in Greenwich shows that the under-performance of white working-class boys is due in part to a lack of a sense of identity—they do not know who they are. We are selling our children short by failing to pass on to them any significant spiritual and cultural identity. Asian youngsters fare far better, thanks to their stronger sense of family and culture.

The first key stage 2 results showed that Church schools did significantly better than other schools—indeed, the top 64 schools in the league table were Church schools. Could that be, not because they are better resourced, or placed in middle-class areas, or have smaller classes than other schools—none of which is true—but because Church schools teach within a framework defined by a specific vision of the world and what it means to be human, and because they value people for what they are as well as for what they do?

In the midst of our information society, we need to educate our children to know which information is about the war between Bosnians and Serbs, starvation in Ethiopia, or mental breakdown; we need to discover, rediscover and pass on to our children the importance of theology, philosophy and the arts, so that they can learn why there are wars, hunger, homelessness and anger, and seek to change human behaviour accordingly. It is vital to pupils' development that spiritual, moral, social and cultural development form a central part of the curriculum. In the process of doing that, we will answer the wider questions that are so important.

In that context, I welcome the fact that the Bill makes no changes to the provision for religious education and school worship in county schools. There are some who call for the requirement for daily Christian worship to be changed, but from my experience of seeing the assembly that my children attend, I think that such gatherings are inspiring and moving and do no harm at all. That is not only my view, but the view of 69 per cent. of the British public, as expressed in the British social attitudes surveys; only 10 per cent. of the public objected to daily school prayers.

Why should I be worried, when 90 per cent. of primary schools keep to the law on daily Christian assembly? That figure comes from the chief inspector of schools. However, although keeping to the law on assemblies is the norm in the nation's 20,000 primary schools, it is a different picture in the nation's 5,000 secondary schools. According to the chief inspector, instead of 90 per cent. compliance, 75 per cent. of secondary schools do not comply with the law as laid out in statute. Those schools may hold assemblies on some days of the week, but they are still in breach of the law.

I hope that the Minister will encourage those schools to do better and to conform to what the British public want. The Education Act 1944 introduced county schools, which three quarters of children now attend. Any reading of the parliamentary debates as that Bill was going through its stages will confirm the view that county schools were non-denominational, but were intended to be Christian schools, with Christian assemblies. We have to bear that always in mind.

Earlier this year, the Government got into a great deal of trouble when they attempted to cut the number of Church school governors, so that their majority was reduced to one on governing bodies. I am glad that the Government have relented and decided that in those schools the present majority of two or three foundation governors over all other governors should continue. That is fine, but there is a problem: the Bill ends grant-maintained status.

Under the Bill, every GM school must decide to become a community school, a foundation school or a voluntary school. The governing bodies of the Church grant-maintained schools of the type that I send my children to and that the Prime Minister sends his children to—I make no complaint about that: he is entitled to do so and I congratulate him on doing so—must decide which type of school they wish theirs to become.

Obviously, it would be impossible for such a school, with a clear denominational ethos, to become a community school, so the choice will be between a foundation school and a voluntary school. If a school becomes a foundation school, it need not raise the 15 per cent. for its capital spending—which is fine—but the five [illegible] outnumbered by the 15 other governors, so there is no guarantee that the religious ethos of the school can be maintained. I do not believe, therefore, that those schools will take that route. If, however, the school becomes a voluntary aided school, the foundation governors will be in the majority but the school must raise 15 per cent. of any capital spending.

Dick Turpin would accost his victims with the phrase,"Your money or your life." Grant-maintained schools are in a similar dilemma. They must choose between money or their ethos—their religious life. Why cannot they have, as they have in recent years, both enhanced flexibility on finance and control of their religious ethos?

9.15 pm

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): Nearly half of 11-year-olds leave primary school without reaching the expected standard for their age. That is a damning indictment of the previous Government and a massive challenge for the new Labour Government.

Reaching our new education targets will be no mean feat. By 2002, we want three quarters of 11-year-olds to reach the expected standards in maths and 80 per cent. to reach those in English. We do not want a generation of our children blighted in the labour market, failed by our education system. There is a growing wage gap between these who are skilled and those who are unskilled and poorly educated. Teachers will receive the help that they need to deliver our demanding education standards. Class sizes will be reduced, there will be additional training, and local education authorities will give support.

I have tremendous admiration for teachers, most of whom are dedicated, hard working, highly skilled and incredibly enthusiastic. However, a few cannot cope with the challenges in our classrooms. One such teacher left my daughter, at the age of six, literally bored to tears. She transformed a child who loved school into one who hated it.

Luckily, we resolved that problem within half a term, but such intervention should not be left to worried parents. Therefore I enthusiastically endorse the procedures to remove incompetent teachers from the classroom when all other measures to improve performance have failed.

That teacher was computer-phobic. She denied the class a vital tool for raising educational standards, in a school with a very deprived catchment area. I believe that on-line learning can really open up the curriculum to those who are left cold by traditional methods. I find it exciting that such technology can broaden horizons, not just for the most able but—perhaps even more important—for the least able. New technology is especially effective in getting through to pupils with special needs.

Two years ago, the Prime Minister said that the Labour Government would connect every school in Britain to the super-highway. That policy is now in place and those schools will be linked up free of charge. However, I believe that, under a Labour Government, we can do that much earlier, and that the United Kingdom can set the pace for schools in Europe and throughout the world.

My local education authority, Staffordshire, has scored a national first and has led the way in the use of information technology. It has set up its own learning net—the Staffordshire learning net—connecting all education providers through learning centres. Those learning centres will be open not just to school and university students, but to the local community, which will make them—the schools and learning centres involved—the centre of their communities.

That will create tremendous opportunities for schools, other educational institutions and businesses, enabling them to work together to raise standards of literacy, numeracy and subject knowledge. That is much more productive than the old-style competitive culture fostered by the Tory Government, which divided schools and made them compete against each other and against other educational institutions. The learning net is bringing together the expertise of educational institutions, to the benefit of our pupils in Staffordshire.

We have home-grown computer software companies such as Europress, whose chairman lives in my constituency. Those companies are desperate to meet the challenge offered by Labour. They are presenting programs that will support educational standards in the classroom, and will replace many of the American programs that are so inappropriate for our schools. I believe that, under Labour, we will enter a really exciting time for educational progress.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): This has been a full debate. Because of the length of the Bill, it has raised many questions—questions to which we hope the Minister will be able to give answers. In Committee, we shall not only seek further clarification, but try to persuade the Minister to alter some of the clauses. I hope that he is in a receptive mode—this being the time of year when wishes are granted—and I hope that, in this wonderful spirit of co-operation, he will listen to me when I say what I want for Christmas.

In the 1980s, it was right to introduce the national curriculum, and to set up more effective management systems to develop a more effective inspection arrangement and inform parents in a better way. The changes were necessary and useful. I am pleased to say that I quoted those words directly from the Government's White Paper, in which the Secretary of State promised not only to keep the changes made by the Conservative Government in the 1980s but to develop them. We welcome that. There are many things in the White Paper—and now in the Bill—that we will support, because they build on tried and tested changes in education that were introduced by the last Government.

It may be somewhat churlish of me—but why not?—to say that, at the time, it was the Labour party that opposed just about all those changes. We welcome the party's conversion, as my hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) said, but we will oppose the Bill—not because of the elements that I have mentioned, which we support, but because we believe that the Bill makes significant changes to the future of education that will damage children, parents and schools.

For one thing, the Bill significantly reduces choice. I do not just mean that that was introduced by the last Government; clearly, choice in education—the variety of schools, and the mix of schools—has proved successful in helping to drive up standards, and parents clearly want it. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have given examples to prove that parents—they themselves, as parents—have exercised choice, and they have been able to do so only because of the variety of schools that are now available thanks to the previous Government's policy.

The two types of secondary school that are under threat are grammar and grant-maintained schools. My hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) said how much he, as a parent, valued the chance to chose a grant-maintained Church primary school for his children because of the school's ethos and the fact that it met the needs of parents looking for a school that replicated the parental view on religious education. That is important to many parents.

The Minister has modified the changes which the Bill will make to Church schools since the White Paper was first published. However, religious education and the ethos of a school are important. We have received representations, particularly from Catholic schools, which are nervous about their future. They want the opportunity to preserve and continue to offer that ethos in their schools, which parents have chosen for very good reasons.

Many questions about the future of grammar schools remain unanswered. I hope that the Minister will set our minds at rest, because many hon. Members on both sides of the House have mentioned grammar schools tonight. They are particularly concerned about the ballot and how it will be run. The Government often use words that are familiar to those of us with a marketing background. In Committee, we shall look for more than mere language; we shall look for action, and shall want to know exactly what that language means.

For example, if the Minister intends that a ballot will be used to determine a grammar school's future existence and portrays that method as a democratic process, we shall look beyond the words and will want to know just how democratic that process will be. We shall want to know who the Minister will select to take part in the ballot.

Clearly, ballots are in essence democratic, but the electorate who subscribe to a ballot could mean that a ballot has been rigged, for want of a better word, to ensure a certain outcome. We shall therefore look to the Government to ensure that actions follow their words. If ballots are to be truly democratic, the detail that is missing from the face of the Bill must be provided so that we can say that the Government are not totally against grammar schools, and the ballots will be democratic in the truest sense of the word.

We are also concerned about choices in other types of schools, particularly primary schools in rural areas. I have raised this matter with the Minister before, and other hon. Members have mentioned it tonight.

Under clause 33, schedule 7 gives the Secretary of State new reserve powers to direct local education authorities and governing bodies to make proposals for the "rationalisation of school places", and make such proposals himself. We seek clarification on that provision. because, although some small rural primary schools may not be full, to achieve the Government's objective of classes of no more than 30 pupils, they would be under threat of "rationalisation".

Some such primary schools teach across an age range of between 5 and 7. Small village primary schools should not be rationalised by simply closing one and making parents transport their children to another, which is not of their choice and which may be in a village some distance away. The question of choice in primary schools is therefore in jeopardy. We want reassurance now and further reassurances in Committee.

Grammar schools were described by a Labour Member as an infernal institution. I attended such an infernal institution—

Mr. Willis: Look what it has done for you.

Mrs. Browning: Indeed. The Minister also attended such an institution, and the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) said that she had attended Cheltenham ladies college, which must have been a wonderful experience for her. For children such as myself, whose parents could not have afforded it but who were able to attend a grammar school, it was an opportunity that we would not otherwise have had.

Labour Members who have benefited from selective education, or from what they choose to call a privileged education because they were able to pay for it, should acknowledge that that variety and choice in our education system has been a strength. It would be a great pity if, merely for reasons of dogma and prejudice, the Bill deprived future generations of young people, regardless of parental income, of an opportunity to attend a school such as many of us have benefited from.

The future of grammar schools hangs in the balance, and we look to the Minister to reassure us. My right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), and my hon. Friends the Members for Faversham and Mid–Kent (Mr. Rowe) and for Salisbury (Mr. Key) particularly asked about the appropriate feeder schools and the relevant parents. They wanted to know the details that would determine the future of our grammar schools.

The other point on which we will divide the House is structure. When the Secretary of State brought the White Paper to the Floor of the House, he said that it was about standards, not structure.

Mr. Blunkett: It was.

Hon. Members: It is.

Mrs. Browning: Perhaps someone would like to bid that it will be. If the Bill is to be about standards, not structures, the Government will have to make significant changes to it in Committee. At present, it is all about structure. Almost 100 extra powers are given to the Secretary of State alone. That does not even include the additional powers—[Interruption.] It is Christmas, and Labour Members have obviously become power-crazed. They want more power, and they will vote themselves more power.

Nothing in the word "partnership" in a party or a Government implies power on that scale, yet all the way through the debate, we have heard the word "partnership"—another marketing term that we recognise. If the word means anything, it means sharing. The Government cannot share if they have taken all the power to themselves. We shall seek considerable changes to the Bill through amendments in Committee.

The Liberal Democrats say that they will vote with the Government tonight—[Interruption.]—constructive opposition indeed—even though their spokesman, the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), expressed his concern about the amount of power—

Mr. Don Foster indicated assent.

Mrs. Browning: The hon. Gentleman nods in agreement. The Liberal Democrats are worried about the Bill, but they will still vote for it. That is the price of four seats around the Cabinet table. They will be with the Labour Government tonight in the Lobby.

The only people who do not seem to be concerned about the power are Labour Members, including those on the Front Bench. The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) made a virtue of the additional powers that the Bill gives to the Secretary of State and the LEAs.

Mr. Barry Jones indicated assent.

Mrs. Browning: Clearly, we must examine the Bill carefully, to see whether those powers are justified or whether it is power for power's sake, as we believe it is. That is another reason why we shall oppose the Bill tonight.

Mr. Barry Jones: My right hon. Friend has taken the powers because the previous Government did not do what had to be done.

Mrs. Browning: The hon. Gentleman should be very clear about where those powers are coming from. They are being taken not from Ministers or the Opposition, but from governors, parents, teachers and head teachers. That is not democracy.

Mr. Rowe: Does my hon. Friend agree that, according to any objective assessment, education in this country since 1945 has suffered because a succession of Governments have taken power to the centre and changed the structure of education? By the time that the structure, which is reluctant to change, has finally accepted it, a new Government has been elected or a new fashion has come into vogue. The education professionals want to be allowed to get on with teaching rather than constantly reorganising.

Mrs. Browning: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. The huge structural changes in the Bill will affect teachers, governing bodies and particularly parents who had taken decisions at a local level and must now re-adapt to the new conditions. Education will be accountable to others, including unelected bodies.

The Opposition are also concerned about the cost of the changes. Any change, however benign, usually involves some form of inherent cost. The additional powers that the Secretary of State seeks through the Bill and the additional responsibilities for LEAs will have cost implications. However, specific sums of money are not allocated to meeting those costs. Clearly, the changes that the Government are introducing in the Bill will be funded from the eduction budget—and that is particularly worrying.

[Mrs. Browning]

At the beginning of the debate, the Secretary of State said, "We have the resources to honour our manifesto commitment." However, there will clearly be a shortfall in the education budget in meeting that manifesto commitment. That point is spelled out in the internal memorandum from the Department for Social Security which has received newspaper coverage in the past 24 or 48 hours.

I shall quote from one paragraph that is relevant to education. In its memorandum to Government Departments, including the Department of Education, the DSS says:

"As you know, DSS—in common with all other Departments—is conducting a Comprehensive Spending Review. The Government has made clear its aim to release resources from social security in order to spend more on health and education and it is likely that a high proportion of the necessary savings will have to come"—

[Interruption.]—it is a memo all the same—

"from benefits paid to sick and disabled people, including compensatory benefits for industrial injuries."

Either the right hon. Gentleman has not squared his departmental budget with the Chancellor, or the Government have only just discovered the additional costs inherent in the Bill—particularly those associated with the administration and bureaucracy that the new powers will require. The Government must now consider taking money from disability benefit in order to meet the departmental budget. [Interruption.]

Labour Members are moaning and groaning. I assure them that this is the second time—

Ms Hodge: It is not true.

Mrs. Browning: I had a meeting with the Secretary of State for Social Security on Thursday evening as part of the all-party disability group. When the memorandum was read to her, she had the opportunity to deny its implications, but she would not do so. The hon. Lady should not say that it is not true, when the Secretary of State chose categorically not to deny it on Thursday night.

Ms Hodge: I was saying that it was not true because the hon. Lady is frightening people who are in genuine need because of their disabilities with the threat that their needs will not be properly met by the Government, when they will be.

Mrs. Browning: I say to the hon. Lady for the second time from the Opposition Dispatch Box in three weeks that, if what I am saying is not true, and if she believes that it is frightening people, let the Prime Minister, in the Chamber or outside this place, deny what I am alleging. The right hon. Gentleman has refused so far to do so.

We are talking of costs and the dissipation of the education budget, which means that moneys will not be going where they are really needed, which is into the classroom. These are reasons why we shall not support the Bill. We know that there is a shortfall in the part of the budget which the Government said would come from the assisted places scheme. The argument has been supported by the Institute of Public Finance.

It is clear that there are many shortfalls in the Bill, and we look forward to the opportunity in Committee of trying to persuade the Government to change their mind. We look to the Minister tonight to answer the many questions that we have put to the Government. I shall recap on some of those questions to which we are urgently seeking answers. Will the Minister limit the frequency of ballots on the future of grammar schools? If parents can vote for the abolition of grammar schools, why can they not vote for their introduction? Is the Minister to say this evening, "That's it, they will all wither on the vine"?

Will the Minister guarantee that the only individuals who will be able to vote on the future of grammar schools are those parents who have children attending those schools? Will the hon. Gentleman inform the House how many parents need to sign a petition to force a ballot on the future of grammar schools? Will he inform us also in what circumstances he would declare the result of a ballot null and void?

We would like to know also how many jobs will be lost as a result of the abolition of the funding agency with responsibility for schools. How many new employees will local education authorities have to take on to cope with the additional administrative costs resulting from the incorporation of GM schools into the state sector?

May we also have details of how much it will cost LEAs to draw up the early years development plan and education development plan? How much will it cost the taxpayer to pay for the ballots on the future of grammar schools? How much does the Minister expect the ballots on the future status of BM schools to cost? If the hon. Gentleman can give us all these costings, perhaps he will tell us also where the money will come from.

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. Stephen Byers): I shall try to answer some of the questions of the hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mr. Browning), but in the minute or two that I have lost I may miss one or two of them. I will respond in writing to the questions that I do not cover in my reply.

I thank all those Members who have taken part in the debate, and I offer my commiserations to those Back-Bench Members who have not been able to make their contributions. I know from personal experience how frustrating it can be to sit in the Chamber for hours on end listening to other Members' speeches when, of course, the best speech of the evening would have been one's own, which failed to be delivered.

The Government are committed to building a modern Britain and a decent society. To achieve that, we shall need a world-class schools system. The Bill will play an important part in ensuring that we can have an education system that meets the needs of our children and our country. I am prepared to recognise—and take great pleasure in doing so—the vital role played by teachers in achieving that aim. Many teachers do a good job, often in difficult circumstances, and when we have a chance to debate an education measure such as this Bill, it is entirely appropriate that we should applaud those teachers who are doing such good work.

When the White Paper was published, the Government were prepared to listen. As a result of that consultation, we have made certain changes to our original proposals. The hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh) referred to one or two changes that we made in relation to Church schools—changes that have been warmly welcomed. I was concerned to hear the observations from the shadow Minister to the effect that concerns are still felt about Roman Catholic schools. I was unaware of such concerns. Cardinal Hume has written to say how pleased he is personally with the way in which the Government have responded to the observations of Roman Catholic schools. If the shadow Minister will provide details, I am sure that we, the Government, will be prepared to take them up.

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend the shadow Minister may have been worried about the subject that I raised. I shall be grateful for the Minister's response because many parents are concerned. What of the Church grant-maintained primary schools, which will be forced into choosing to become secular foundation schools or to return to the status of voluntary-aided schools, which means that they will have to raise 15 per cent. of their finance? At present, they have the advantage of being denominational schools and not having to raise that finance. Will the Minister comment on that powerful point?

Mr. Byers: I am happy to do so. It is important for Members to recognise that every school will be able to choose its category—either immediately in respect of the majority of grant-maintained schools or within 12 or 18 months in respect of all other schools. Although there will be an indicative allocation at the beginning, it will not be for ever, and schools will be able to choose their final categories. We are able to offer that reassurance to the small, grant-maintained Church of England primary schools to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

We have made changes to reflect the concerns of the Churches and many other organisations and groups, but we accept that we cannot meet all those concerns. That applies to all consultation. Not everyone says the same thing, and there are different views and opinions about the direction in which the Government should go. As a result of the changes that have been introduced arising from the White Paper consultation, we now have a far better Bill than we had originally—one that will meet the needs of our children. The Bill carries forward our ambitious agenda in government to put in place our historic pledge to reduce infant class sizes to 30 or fewer. We want to get the basics right, and that means starting in the early years of education.

The Bill puts schools in the forefront of our drive to raise standards, but provides LEAs with a clear challenge to help them. We want to establish a genuine partnership. Schools want candid friends, but they do not want outside control, which will not happen as a result of the measures in the Bill.

The Bill also demonstrates the Government's readiness to take their share of responsibility at every level. The education action zones call for radical and original ideas. We want to liberate local initiative to solve local problems and to help to build the schools of the next century.

The Bill also modernises the 1944 settlement. Too much time and energy has been wasted on exploring divisions in the system, leaving not enough for thinking about what can unite us in raising standards and extending opportunities.

Mr. Ian Bruce: May I raise one matter which would have been in the speech that I did not make? How will the Government determine the allocation of money for special pleadings, such as reducing class sizes, when the standard spending assessment in counties such as Dorset is always overspent and more money goes in, yet inner cities that keep being given more money never spend the total standard spending assessment? How will the Government determine who gets the money and who does not?

Mr. Byers: I can understand why the hon. Member for South Dorset (Mr. Bruce), with his majority of 77, raises such very local issues. Let us look at the facts.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): Answer the question.

Mr. Byers: I shall take great pleasure in doing so. The hon. Gentleman says that Dorset is being discriminated against in favour of inner-city authorities. In the settlement made by this Government, Dorset received a 6 per cent. increase in its education standard spending assessment over and above the national average of 5.7 per cent. For the first time in many years—certainly since the hon. Member for South Dorset was elected in 1987—new money is coming into schools in his constituency and in Dorset.

The shadow Secretary of State attacked the basic principle that he felt underpinned the Bill—a greater degree of centralisation. We believe that the basic principle is not centralisation but, in fact, decisive Government action—[Interruption.] Whereas Conservative Members were prepared to stand to one side and see a local education authority such as Hackney failing to deliver education to the 30,000 children in Hackney—

Mr. Hayes: Labour Hackney.

Mr. Byers: It does not matter whether it is Labour Hackney or not. Without fear or favour, we shall intervene to protect children in any local education authority. That is what we are prepared to do. When an authority fails to discharge its legal duties, as was the case in Hackney, this Government will not stand to one side. The previous Government washed their hands of any responsibility; this Government will not. There were 30,000 reasons for the intervention that we made in Hackney: the 30,000 children who are educated in Hackney. We have a responsibility to those children, and it is one that we shall discharge.

Mr. Dorrell: Do I take it, therefore, that the Minister no longer believes, as he did in 1993, that

"all our experience clearly shows that nationalisation, and the dead hand of Whitehall, lead to a universal system up and down the country, rather than the diversity that the Government pretend to favour."—[Official Report, 2 March 1993; Vol. 220, c. 179.]

Has he changed his mind?

Mr. Byers: I am always prepared to change my mind if I am wrong. In fact, however—I had the opportunity to refresh my memory when I left the debate for an hour—in the debate in 1993 the situation was quite different.

In this Bill, we are not prescribing how LEAs or schools are to improve standards. We are laying down targets to raise standards. It will be for local education authorities and individual schools to decide how they reach those targets. They will be monitored against their performance, but we will not intervene. We will promote best practice and show what works well. It is only right that we should do that. It will not be imposed on anybody. We shall encourage and assist them to raise standards in schools.

That is totally counter to the Education Act 1993, which centralised control in the hands of the Secretary of State for Education. In fact, more than 400 new powers were given as a result of that measure. There are a modest 100 or so in this Bill. Those powers are there for a reason: to ensure that there will be no hiding place for under-performance—whether in schools, local education authorities or, yes, in government. We have a Secretary of State for Education and Employment who is prepared to be judged on raising standards, and a ministerial team who support him in that objective.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): Will the Minister explain why, if the Secretary of State will not be prescribing what happens in schools and LEAs, it is necessary for him to take powers to monitor and change what LEAs and schools put in their education development plan?

Mr. Byers: It is for the simple reason that the education development plan will be the way in which we monitor levels of performance. Targets will be set for LEAs—but we set targets for ourselves in government as well. We have been prepared to say that the present system, which we inherited after 18 years of the hon. Lady's party being in power, in which just 57 per cent. of 11-year-olds attained the required level in English and 54 per cent. did so in mathematics, is unacceptable. That is why we have said that at the end of the Parliament we want 80 per cent. of 11-year-olds to reach the required level in English and 75 per cent. to do so in mathematics. We are prepared to be judged on meeting those targets. We have said that LEAs need to be set targets as well. Indeed, in partnership with schools, LEAs need to set school-based targets.

We make no apology for adopting a system in which people are clearly accountable. This is not command and control; it is ensuring that we raise standards in our schools and give our children the best possible start. The previous Government washed their hands of that responsibility. We shall not do that.

Some concerns have been raised about how the infant class size pledge will be implemented. We are confident that, with the measures contained in the Bill and with the resources that we will get from the phasing out of the assisted places scheme, we will deliver that pledge. The pledge is that, by September 2001, no child of five, six or seven will be in a class of more than 30 pupils. That pledge is central to our standards agenda and it will be delivered, in contrast to what happened under the previous Administration.

We now have more than 500,000 primary schoolchildren in classes of more than 30 and the figure has continued to escalate. In 1992, 25 per cent. of primary school pupils were in classes of more than 30. That was bad enough, but in 1997, after five years of neglect, 33 per cent. of primary schoolchildren were in classes of more than 30.

The hon. Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Mrs. Browning) mentioned Devon. Five years ago, under the Conservative Administration, 28 per cent. of Devon primary schoolchildren were in classes of 30 or more, and the figure is now 38 per cent.

Mrs. Browning: Under Liberal Democrat control.

Mr. Byers: I blame central Government for not introducing a system that could deliver on the pledge. The Bill will ensure that, whoever is in control locally—Conservatives, Liberal Democrats or Labour—the pledge will be delivered, because children should not be subject to a local lottery to decide whether they are in smaller classes. We will deliver on our pledge.

Mrs. Browning: My constituency has many old rural schools which have Victorian campuses with no room for extra classrooms. If children at those schools have to bus seven or 10 miles in the early morning and at half-past three in the afternoon, to the next village because the existing primary school cannot accommodate them—and that is what will happen—their parents will not thank the Minister or the Labour party.

Mr. Byers: The hon. Lady has missed an important part of our proposals to deliver our pledge. The recurrent spending will be funded by the phasing out of the assisted places scheme. I take the point that some money will also need to be spent on buildings, and that is why the new deal capital made available in the Budget on 2 July will provide additional resources to ensure that that can happen.

In relation to the school framework, several concerns were raised about the ballots for grammar school status and the retention of a selective system. I assure the right hon. Member for Charnwood (Mr. Dorrell) that, although technical regulations may not be ready in time for consideration of the Bill in Committee, we will make a full statement on our proposals, so that the policy will be clearly outlined at the relevant stage. It would be inappropriate to have technical legal regulations ready at that stage, but we will be able to answer all the specific questions that have been raised this evening.

We are still consulting, and I had a useful meeting with hon. Members who represent constituencies in Buckinghamshire about the particular problems faced by that area. I would be especially interested to meet the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) to discuss the issue that he raised earlier about North Yorkshire. It is clear that all 164 grammar schools are in a different situation, and we must ensure that we have the right approach for each of those schools.

Mr. Dorrell: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way at this stage in the debate. If he will not publish the draft technical regulations, will he give an assurance that he will publish, before the relevant Committee stage, a statement of the principles that will determine the myriad regulations for which the Bill paves the way?

Mr. Byers: I am happy to give an undertaking that, when we get to the relevant Committee stage, we will give a clear statement of our approach to the regulations for grammar schools.

The Government inherited a bitter legacy from 18 years of Conservative Government. We inherited a school system with no sense of direction, lacking in confidence and under-resourced. That has to change—and as a result of this Bill it will change. We will cut class sizes for infants. We will provide a nursery place for every four-year-old. We will provide more than £1 billion for school building. This is a radical agenda from a radical, reforming Government. The Bill is based on education excellence for all and raising standards in our schools. It will bring glad tidings of comfort and joy to parents throughout the country. I commend the Bill to the House.

Withernsea and South-East Holderness

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dowd.]

10.11 pm

Mr. James Cran (Beverley and Holderness): I am very grateful indeed to have the opportunity to raise what I consider to be a matter of some importance to my constituency: the difficulties of the town of Withernsea and of—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Will hon. Members please not hold a Christmas party at this moment?

Mr. Cran: I am very grateful indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was manfully doing my best under the circumstances.

The problem is serious; it is not one of which I have first-hand knowledge, in the sense of having lived with it since I have been the Member of Parliament for Beverley, because I inherited the area at the most recent boundary commission change; but I am becoming increasingly concerned about what I have seen in the town, and about the fact that, as far as I can see, the problem has simply been ignored by almost every agency that could possibly exist for the benefit and help of such towns and areas.

What has occurred is simply a downward spiral of economic and social decline. The town and the area are unable to get out of that spiral on their own. I am grateful to see the Minister here. She knows something about the issue, because she has written to me on the subject, so what I hear will at least be first hand.

The Minister knows that I am concerned about the condition of the town. I could spend a long time outlining the indices of deprivation, but I shall confine myself to noting that, on any such index, the town is at the bottom, if the bottom is the worst. Unemployment in the area is the highest in East Yorkshire and, I suspect, for quite a way around. The number of cars per household shows the same situation, and long-term illness is the worst not only in my constituency but in the whole of East Yorkshire. The quality of housing is, alas, not what it should be: local tax figures show that housing is all in the lower bands. Almost more sadly, educational attainment is below that in the rest of the area. No one can be other than concerned about that.

In passing, I note that I probably did not get many votes from the town and the area, but that does not matter. We must consider such problems in a non-political way. As soon as I saw the problems, I was determined to do what I could to bring them to the attention of those who can take decisions that might change the situation. Despite the fact that there is great willingness for self-help, there are no pump-priming resources to help people to develop a strategy for tourism. After all, it was one of the great towns of Victorian England that grew up at the seaside to serve as holiday resorts for cities such as Hull.

Community spirit undoubtedly still exists, but I worry that, if all the town's requests for help continue to be refused, people will come to the likes of me and ask what is the point of going to the next port of call for further representations. I am trying desperately hard to get them to understand that we have to keep going. It is only by speaking to the Minister that we can bring the problems to the attention of the Government.

People tell me, rightly, that millions of pounds were spent to help our great cities when they were in decline. I have no difficulty with that proposition. The nearest city to my constituency, the great city of Kingston upon Hull, got hundreds of millions of pounds. The difference that that has made in the past 20 years has been as chalk and cheese to what has happened only a few miles down the road. Withernsea is a much smaller community of about 6,000 people. It has fallen through every resource net that I can think of. The result is the decline that we are discussing.

I am pleased that the Minister nods. That shows that she knows the problems of such areas. The problem is illustrated by the fact that Swanland in my old constituency qualifies for European regional development funds, but, for reasons that I will never understand, Withernsea, with all its problems, has no access to them. I suspect that arbitrary lines were drawn on a map. I dare say that it was done under the Government whom I supported at the general election, but that does not mean that it is right; it clearly is not. That is why I hope that the Minister and all the other decision takers will look at the matter dispassionately and, if such situations can occur, ask what in heaven's name they can do to reorient policy to help such communities.

As I have already said, the community spirit exists. I am pleased to say that the belief in self-help is also present, which I find quite extraordinary given what I have seen in the town, and the difficulties that it has faced and still suffers. The Minister will be aware of the Withernsea 2000 partnership, which aims to consolidate the views of the key decision takers in the area—the East Yorkshire council, the training and enterprise council, the Yorkshire tourist board, the town council and even individuals.

I am delighted to say that there also entrepreneurs in the town who want to contribute something to help the process of regeneration. They simply cannot do that on their own; they need a helping hand to offer not just encouragement but resources. In the scheme of such things, the resources necessary are not that great, but the area needs such pump priming.

The Minister also knows better than anyone else that Withernsea entered, meritoriously, the rural challenge competition for the second time. It was the only bid that came from East Yorkshire and north Lincolnshire, but again the town's bid failed. I can do no better than read from the letter that was sent to me on 25 November by the Minister for the Environment, who stated:

"I thought I should write to let you know that East Riding of Yorkshire and North Lincolnshire's Turning the Tide—Withernsea bid has been unsuccessful in this year's round of Rural Challenge. The competition, which is sponsored on our behalf by the Rural Development Commission, aims to encourage innovative partnerships and new ideas for regeneration of the countryside."

The outcome of that competition is wonderful for the area that won because it will be able to use whatever plans it has for the regeneration of its particular neck of the woods, but we are on our tod yet again.

We drew some comfort from the Minister's letter, in which he also wrote:

"Officials from the Commission are ready to discuss with the partnership the outcome of the competition and whether it may be possible to provide support for the project by alternative means."

[Mr. Cran]

The words "alternative means" are important, because I understand that the other sources of finance available to the Rural Development Commission require matching funding. I understand perfectly well why that condition is part of the deal, but I regret to say that, apart from East Yorkshire council, there is not much matching funding of any significant proportion to be had in the town or the surrounding area. I dare say some exists, but it is simply not available in the amounts required to liberate funds of any size from the commission.

On the basis of the Minister's letter, I went hot foot to see the director of operations at the RDC, and we had a constructive meeting. I do not believe that I betray any confidence when I say that he explained to me exactly why towns such as Withernsea have such problems. I do not believe that I betray any confidence if I say that he understood exactly the position of places such as Withernsea.

What do we do about that? Again, I do not believe I am betraying any confidence between us when I recount how said that he would do his best within tight resources to see whether there was money here, there or wherever that could be liberated for a strategy to develop the town's tourist potential or small businesses in the town. He was keen to try to do that, but he spent some time pointing out to me that he, too, has difficulties with the schemes that he and the RDC operate. None the less, I took from that meeting the fact that the Rural Development Commission was not going to walk away from the situation, but would look for ways to help the town.

I understand that the Withernsea partnership has had a meeting with the regional RDC. I have not had a report of the meeting's outcome; if the Minister has received a report, perhaps she could tell me what happened. We need to know whether the regional officials mirrored the conversation that I had with the director of operations, who sounded a constructive note and said that the RDC would try to find ways to help.

I could say a great deal more about the details of the case, but I am keen to hear what the Minister has to say rather than to listen to myself. I should like to hear from the Minister that she recognises the problem that I have outlined and the fact that the town cannot succeed on its own; I should also like to hear that the Government will not walk away from the situation and related problems elsewhere.

I hope that the hon. Lady will consider meeting the members of the Withernsea partnership. It will be difficult for them to get down here, as the town is not flush with money, but they will be in Whitehall if the Minister is prepared to meet them. It would be even better if, when she was passing nearby—I am not suggesting a particular date or time—she came to see for herself the difficulties in the area. It would be as much of an education for her as, without doubt, it has been for me.

On one of his tours, the Prince of Wales managed to come along. I was not privy to what he thought, but people who were present have suggested to me that he did not particularly like what he saw. I hope that the Minister will consider all those points. I also hope, more importantly, that she will be open minded about the policy framework. If we have a competition—I understand that it existed under the previous Government—from which only one winner can emerge, that poses significant difficulties for all the other partnerships that have put together good plans. What happens to them? We clearly have to look at this policy stance. If the result on 1 May had been different, I would have been giving exactly the same speech to a Conservative Minister.

I hope that I have outlined the problems—I think that the Minister knows them herself. Confidence is important in such situations, and it is easy for confidence to ebb away from the community so that people say to themselves that there is nothing they can do and nobody is interested in their condition, so they might as well pack up shop. That means that those who are prepared to shove the thing along and do something about the community spirit all melt into the background and the situation becomes worse. I do not think that that will happen, but it could, and I should like to avert that.

I am a pretty right-wing character in the political framework, but I am not particularly daft, and when I see the position that exists in Withernsea I know perfectly well that there is no alternative to the pump priming that only Government can provide.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Angela Eagle): I congratulate the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Cran) on raising this extremely important subject and on managing to acquire the last Adjournment debate before Christmas. I cannot act exactly like Santa Claus for him tonight, but I want to emphasise that I have listened carefully to what he has had to say about Withernsea, and I should like to thank him for bringing the issue to the attention of the House.

The problems are difficult and of quite long standing, so they will be hard to address, but I want to be as encouraging as possible in the face of the disappointment suffered by the partnership as a result of the recent decision on rural challenge. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman would regard this as encouraging, but I would certainly be very happy to meet a delegation from the area—as he suggests. If they get in touch with my office, we can put that in train and discuss where they might be able to go from here.

I come from the east coast of Yorkshire. I was born just up the way in Bridlington, so I appreciate the uniqueness of that part of the country—its beauties as well as its problems. In part, its unspoilt character and remoteness add to its difficulties in terms of economic regeneration. When preparing for the debate, I noticed that the area lost its last railway link in 1964 as part of the Beeching cuts, so the decline has been going on for some time, and it will not be arrested overnight. There has also been a change in the nature of tourism in the United Kingdom. Some would say that the glory days of seaside resorts are long gone, but it is certain that the change in the pattern of tourism has presented many areas with difficult strategic choices.

As a Government, I hope that we can put in place programmes and policies that alleviate the problems of areas such as Withernsea and south-east Holderness. I know that the people there must have been disappointed not to secure resources under rural challenge, but I want to provide some encouragement tonight. The hon.

Gentleman admitted honestly that, in a competition, there are winners and losers; that is certainly the case with rural challenge. Of the 17 national entrants to the competition, only six were chosen and there was an allocated share of £5 million, so many more areas were disappointed than were celebrating.

I want to spend a few minutes focusing on the many strengths of Withernsea's bid, because I strongly believe that within the bid lie the seeds of Withernsea's recovery. First, there was its strong partnership approach: a solid partnership has been established and that can be built on. It includes all the key local partners, including the local authority, Humberside training and enterprise council, English Partnerships and the voluntary sector. A report in the Yorkshire Post dated 3 December suggests that the partnership will look at ways of moving forward some of the projects without rural challenge support. I would encourage that.

It is possible that various elements of the bid could be successfully supported through the Rural Development Commission's rural development programme, which is available to the partnership and which will support worthwhile economic and community projects developed by the public, voluntary and private sectors. It will be for the partnership to decide which priorities it wants to push and how they will fit into the rural development programme strategy and meet the objectives relating to Withernsea.

I understand that, as the hon. Gentleman said, the RDC has already met the rural challenge partners and encouraged them to revisit the bid and consider which projects could be progressed through that programme. I know that the hon. Gentleman has lent his support to the partnership and will do all he can to ensure that its good work continues.

Secondly, community capacity building is another of the bid's strengths that should be concentrated on in future. I congratulate the partnership on attempting a solution to Withernsea's problems that is based on people. I am aware that a formal consultation process was established during the rural challenge bid process, and I would like that to continue. The partnership acknowledges that the capacity of the community is low; I suggest that that be made an immediate priority. As the hon. Gentleman said, community confidence and economic regeneration are inextricably linked—neither can happen without the other. As a Yorkshirewoman, I am aware that it is a proud area—the community has the will to become involved, but the solution will be neither quick nor easy.

Thirdly, the bid contained a strong private sector input and I was impressed that the partnership did not simply rely on a tourism-based solution to the area's problems. The mass tourism market in the United Kingdom has changed, and the tourists who flocked to Withernsea in their tens of thousands in the 1950s and 1960s are not coming back in the same numbers. I live in New Brighton, which is in a similar position. Withernsea's decline has been gradual, so there needs to be effective private sector investment to turn the situation around.

I realise that, without rural challenge funding, the improvements will take longer to effect, but I know that the key economic partners—the local authority, Humberside training and enterprise council, English Partnerships and the RDC—have started the process, and are keen to keep it going. There is much to build on and much that can be retrieved from the bid for the benefit of the people of Withernsea.

Mr. Cran: As I understand it, a number of proposals can be retrieved from the bid, but the problem is the issue of matching funding. Can the Minister give us any hope there?

Angela Eagle: Matching funding is certainly required, and we would have to work with local partners to see where that could be got from. Perhaps we should place that subject on the agenda of the meeting that I have just offered. Certainly the local authority would have to give some priority to the area if we were to try to put together some moneys to make progress possible. I know that English Partnerships has a development of small industrial sites in the area, but it is 70 per cent. empty, so we must do more to generate interest and involvement.

I want to say something about how Government policy will help the economic development of Withernsea. We are putting forward policies to help the regions. We strongly believe that the future success of the English regions depends on the co-operation and participation of the entire community. With that in mind, we have set five key priorities.

The first priority is integration. One of our major steps was to integrate the Department of the Environment and the Department of Transport. That enables us to concentrate on infrastructure developments of the type that are strategically important to Withernsea's recovery.

The second priority is decentralisation, which could also be important. We said in our manifesto that local decision making should be made more accountable to local people. The regional development agencies are a key element in our plans to achieve that.

The third priority is regeneration. We believe that this is not confined to making physical improvements to the infrastructure; it is equally important to regenerate communities, improve the social fabric and foster equality and cohesion.

The fourth priority is partnership. We must work in partnership with the public and private sectors and the voluntary sector to make our policies most effective. There are already many good examples of local partnerships in the region and I feel, as a result of what I know of Withernsea, that a very promising example of such a partnership has been developed locally.

The fifth priority is sustainability. Sustainable development must be built into all our policies, which means combining economic goals with environmental and social ones—improving people's quality of life and helping them to achieve their potential while making sensible use of natural resources.

Government policy will ensure that areas such as Withernsea and south-east Holderness can play an effective role in economic development at regional level. The index of deprivation is being updated. It will recognise need at three levels: district, ward and enumeration district. That should allow Withernsea to register at least as an area of concern in a much more obvious way than may have been the case in the past.

We are conducting a comprehensive review of regeneration spending with the aim of recognising needs at these levels and creating policies that can address them, or at least allow regional development agencies to address them. RDAs will have a remit to regenerate areas of need—such as Withernsea—in their geographical areas. Other initiatives, such as welfare to work, capital receipts, employment and health initiatives, may be tied together to create a package to take Withernsea forward.

We continue to assess and evaluate the impact of our programmes, and we are looking forward and starting the process of considering how regeneration policies should be shaped for the future. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning recently launched a consultation paper entitled "The Way Forward", which is intended to facilitate a debate on the future of Government regeneration programmes. I know that the East Riding of Yorkshire council and the local partnership will want to comment on the proposals and play a full part in the consultation process to ensure that the needs of Withernsea and similar areas are taken fully into account in regeneration programmes of the future.

Many of the themes discussed in the paper are those that the Withernsea partnership addressed in its rural challenge bid, which will stand it in excellent stead in future. There is, for example, the need for a strategic approach. The challenge bid was strategy based; it employed a targeted approach to regeneration, which is vital to ensuring that the activity is properly focused and has local impact. We intend any future regeneration programme to be strategy led.

We are pleased to note that local partners are beginning to pull together to try to improve their prospects. I spoke earlier about the need for effective partnerships. Community involvement is also important: Withernsea and south-east Holderness must continue to develop community capacity. That is the key to long-term sustainable development.

As I said, there are other areas that we may be able to bring to bear on the problem—welfare to work, for example. We hope that that will begin to turn the tide in the area and that our proposals will assist Withernsea with programmes targeted on more isolated areas. The focus for welfare to work is the young unemployed; the worst consequence of unemployment is its effects on the human spirit.

Work has already started in Withernsea that will ensure provision of a high-quality programme for the young unemployed. The local Employment Service office has set up a rural East Riding specialist strand to present suggestions as to how to help the more isolated communities. All providers under the new deal—whether they are in the voluntary sector, in further education or private sector training providers—have been asked by the local Employment Service office to come up with plans to help unemployed clients in rural areas. Community and distance learning packages will also be available. Providers are located across the district and will therefore be well placed to meet the needs of clients in rural and coastal areas.

We are determined that welfare to work should make a real and tangible contribution to the improvement of the economy. Strengthening the capacity of the English regions to address the issues will also be important to ensuring that, strategically, areas such as Withernsea—which time has passed by and which are never big enough to attract attention—will have the prospect of being taken into account at regional development agency level. We trust that packages will be put together to help to give hope.

As I have said, we believe that there are firm foundations in the bid on which to build—

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock, and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, till Monday 12 January, pursuant to Resolution [15 December].

Adjourned at nineteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

TREASURY

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimate of the effect on the PSBR in (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99, and (c) 1999–2000 of the new estimates of GDP growth for such years contained in the "Pre-Budget Report, November 1997". [19957]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 10 December 1997]: The new forecast of the PSBR, incorporating the new projections of GDP growth, are set out in Table B6 of the "Pre-Budget Report, November 1997".

Mr. Malcom Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the reduction in the public sector borrowing requirement in (a) 1998–99 and (b) 1999–2000 which would result from an upward revision to the projected growth of gross domestic product for each of these years from the figure of 1.75 per cent. contained in Table B2, page 98, of the "Pre-Budget Report, November 1997", to a rate of 2.25 per cent. per annum. [19756]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 10 December 1997]: Ready reckoner estimates of the effect on the PSBR of changes to GDP growth are published in Treasury Occasional Paper, No. 4, "Public Finances and The Cycle".

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in all future financial statement and budget reports and pre-budget reports, cash estimates of the cyclically-adjusted public sector borrowing requirement on a current balance basis; and if he will make a statement. [19933]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 10 December 1997]: The July 1997 Financial Statement and Budget Report, and the Pre-Budget Report, both included charts of the cyclically-adjusted current balance as a percentage of GDP. The Pre-Budget Report discussion paper, "A Code for Fiscal Stability", suggested that the Code should require the Government to publish a wider range of reports and information on the economic and fiscal outlook, including estimates of the cyclically-adjusted fiscal position. The Government are inviting comments on the proposals in that paper.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he intends to make the Financial Services Authority responsible for giving advice to and monitoring the performance of financial institutions in relation to money laundering; and what resources he will make available for this purpose. [20122]

Mrs. Liddell: We intend that the FSA's statutory objectives should include monitoring, detecting and preventing financial crime. The FSA is funded by charges on the industry.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his forecast of the total community charge and council tax receipts in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99. [20551]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The Government's estimates of these receipts were included in Table S2.4 in "The Economy and Public Finances: Supplementary Material" to the Pre-Budget Report which was published on 25 November. A copy of this was placed in the Library of the House.

(6) who was the beneficial owner of the 2.95 million TransTec shares prior to their transfer into the Orion Trust; [20922]

(7) what factors led the Paymaster General not to transfer into his blind trust, the legal title to the whole of the amount owing to him beneficially by Stenbell Ltd.; [20921]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I refer the right hon. Member to the answers I gave on 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 575–76.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

EU Enlargement

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from the Russian Federation on the security implications for the Kaliningrad enclave of the proposed enlargement of the EU; and if he will make a statement. [20466]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: None.

Land Mines

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information her Department has collated regarding casualties being caused in Egypt by land mines laid during World War II. [20632]

Mr. Fatchett: None. The only figures available are those quoted by the Egyptian authorities.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to his Department by the Egyptian Government concerning land mines laid by the United Kingdom. [20633]

Mr. Fatchett: The British Embassy in Cairo have a continuing dialogue with the Egyptian authorities about land mines laid during the second world war. In 1996, we donated £500,000 of mine clearance equipment to the Egyptians from the aid budget. A further £100,000 is earmarked during the current financial year for additional mine clearing equipment.

DEFENCE

Chinook ZD576

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current location of the wreckage of Chinook ZD576; what plans he has to dispose of it; and if he will make a statement. [20818]

Mr. Spellar: The wreckage of Chinook ZD576 is currently stored at the Naval Aircraft Repair Organisation at Fleetlands and will be retained for as long as necessary, taking into account the views of the next of kin, and any outstanding claims for compensation.

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish the names of all those people whom he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed, and whether they receive remuneration. [19968]

Mr. Spellar: I regret that in putting together the answer to this question it has become apparent that there was an error in the answer I gave to my hon. Friend's previous question on 24 November 1997, Official Report, column 391. The figure did not include the reappointments which had been made to the Register of Members of the Defence Scientific Advisory Council, one of MOD's advisory Non Departmental Public Bodies, and it included a paid employee at the Fleet Air Arm Museum. The correct figure should therefore have been 68, of which 58, or 85 per cent. receive remuneration.

Plastic Baton Rounds

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what efforts have been made (a) by his Department and (b) in conjunction with other departments to identify how many faulty plastic baton rounds were exported; and whether these plastic baton rounds have been recalled or the appropriate authorities notified. [20049]

Mr. Spellar: No plastic baton rounds, of the type withdrawn from operational use by the Army this year, have been exported; this has been confirmed by the manufacturer.

Aircraft Carriers

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when each of the three aircraft carriers are expected to reach the end of their service lives. [20076]

Dr. Reid: HM Ships Invincible, Illustrious and Ark Royal were commissioned in July 1980, June 1982 and November 1985 respectively. The life expectancy of the Invincible Class aircraft carriers is expected to be in the order of 30 years, although this will be kept under review.

RAF Watton

Mrs. Shephard: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of maintaining the premises at the former RAF Watton in the last year for which figures are available. [20819]

Mr. Spellar: The cost of maintaining RAF Watton pending disposal during the last 12 months was approximately £110,000. This provided for ensuring that the buildings are maintained in a weathertight and vandal-proof condition, basic maintenance such as grass cutting, meeting Health and Safety requirements and employing a 24 hour Security Guard Service.

Gulf War

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 17 November 1997, Official Report, column 71, if he will now publish the results of his inquiries into dead animals found and analysed during the Gulf War; and if he will make a statement. [20900]

Dr. Reid: My Department is still awaiting information in respect of one important aspect of this matter from outside MOD. If we are not able to obtain that further information shortly, I will publish what we have found so far, although this may leave this aspect unresolved.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Wages

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many full-time employees in his Department are paid at an hourly rate of (a) £3.59, (b) between £3.60 and £3.75 and (c) between £3.76 and £4. [20609]

Dr. Howells: The number of full-time employees in the Department for Education and Employment paid at an hourly rate of:

(a) £3.59 is 25;

(b) between £3.60 and £3.75 is 1;

(c) between £3.76 and £4.00 is 5.

Self-financing Students

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the effect of currency turbulence in south-east Asia on the numbers of assisted and self-financed students coming to Britain from those countries. [20321]

Dr. Howells: The effects of currency turbulence in south-east Asia will vary in different countries and for different individuals. This is a complex and unpredictable issue and it is unlikely that an overall assessment of any effect on numbers can be made in the short to medium term.

Disability Rights Task Force

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will appoint a person with a learning disability to the Disability Rights Task Force. [20560]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The question of whether a person with learning disabilities should be appointed to the Disability Rights Task Force has already been raised with me. I have invited the Chair and Chief Executive of Mencap to discuss this with me.

Superhighways Initiative

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the Education Department's superhighways initiative evaluation is now complete; and when the synoptic report of that evaluation will be published. [21331]

Dr. Howells: Project evaluation was completed over the summer. The report is to be released today and we have placed a copy in the Library.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Youth Justice System

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses he has received to each of the three consultation papers on reform of the youth justice system; and if he will publish a summary of those responses. [21311]

Mr. Straw: By 8 December 1997, a total of 297 responses had been received to the consultation paper "Tackling Youth Crime" (published 25 September); 250 responses to the consultation paper "New National and Local Focus on Youth Crime" (published 9 October); and 177 responses to the consultation paper "Tackling Delays in the Youth Justice System" (published 15 October). Summaries of the responses to each of the three papers have been placed in the Library.

Intelligence Service and Crime Squad

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what key objectives and performance indicators he proposes to set for the National Criminal Intelligence Service and the National Crime Squad for 1998–99. [21309]

Mr. Straw: We intend that the provisions of the Police Act 1997 relating to the National Criminal Intelligence Service (NCIS) and the National Crime Squad should be fully implemented on 1 April 1998. I have determined, following the consultation process required under the Police Act 1997, that the key objectives and performance indicators for the National Criminal Intelligence Service and National Crime Squad for 1998–99 will be:

National Criminal Intelligence Service Objectives:

1. To improve the quality of criminal intelligence available from overseas about criminals engaged in serious and organised transnational crime which impacts on the United Kingdom.

Performance indicator: Five per cent. increase in the number of intelligence reports disseminated which include material obtained from overseas and which fall within the highest two levels of the NCIS quality matrix.

2. To improve the quality of criminal intelligence available to combat serious and organised crime within the United Kingdom.

Performance indicator: Five per cent. increase in the number of intelligence reports disseminated which fall within the highest two levels of the NCIS quality matrix.

National Crime Squad Objectives:

1. To secure, in co-operation with the Scottish Crime Squad and other law enforcement agencies as necessary, consistent improvement in the quality of operations leading to the arrest and prosecution of individuals or the disruption of criminal enterprises engaged in serious and organised transnational crime which impacts on the United Kingdom.

Performance indicator: Five per cent. increase in individuals charged and criminal enterprises disrupted who were engaged in serious and organised crime which impacts on the United Kingdom.

2. To secure, in co-operation with the Scottish Crime Squad and other law enforcement agencies as necessary, consistent improvement in the quality of operations leading to the arrest and prosecution of individuals or disruption of criminal enterprises engaged in serious and organised crime within the United Kingdom.

Performance indicator: Five per cent. increase in individuals charged and criminal enterprises disrupted who were engaged in serious and organised crime within the United Kingdom.

Racial Violence

Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses to "Racial Violence and Harassment: A Consultation Document" were received; and if he will make a statement. [21310]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: One hundred and eighteen responses were received. A list of respondents and a summary of the main points raised can be found in the Library, in a document entitled: "Responses to the Home Office Consultation Document on Racial Violence and Harassment".

Remand

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses to the consultation document, "Reducing Remand Delays", were received during the consultation period; and if he will publish a summary of those responses. [21330]

Mr. Straw: Twenty one responses were received. A summary of the main points has been placed in the Library.

Plastic Baton Rounds

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the training of police baton gunners in testing weapons, with particular reference to faulty bullets and plastic batons. [20028]

Mr. Michael: Training baton round gunners is the responsibility of individual chief police officers. I would expect forces to train only using equipment which is suitable for the purpose. Baton round gunners do not use bullets. They may sometimes test equipment to check that it is satisfactory or to help in the development of new equipment.

Exports Initiative

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what role the Association of Chief Police Officers played in the (a) establishment and (b) management of the Home Office Export Initiative. [20022]

Mr. Michael: The then President of the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) was asked in October 1995 if the Association wished to nominate a representative of the police service to help establish and manage the Home Office Exports Initiative. ACPO was duly represented on the ISG by a member of the Surrey Police.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which trade associations were involved in the (a) establishment and (b) management of the Home Office Exports Initiative. [20040]

Mr. Michael: Three trade associations were represented on the Home Office Exports Initiative Steering Group: the Association of Police and Public Security Suppliers (APPSS); the British Security Industry Association (BSIA); and the Police Information Technology and Communications Suppliers Association (PITACSA). All three were instrumental in establishing the Initiative, having met senior officials in the Home Office in September 1995 to determine its future strategy.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons he decided to end the Home Office Exports Initiative. [20041]

Mr. Michael: The decision to end the Home Office Exports Initiative was taken in the context of the Government's Comprehensive Spending Review. My right hon. Friend considered that the Initiative did not sit happily with the core functions of the Department, particularly when viewed against the substantial support for exporting given by the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if goods and services supplied under the Home Office Exports Initiative were subject to normal Export Control procedures. [20021]

Mr. Michael: Yes. Where the supply of the goods or services concerned were subject to control, a licence would have been required.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the United Kingdom police forces which participated in the Home Office Exports Initiative. [20031]

Mr. Michael: Police forces in England and Wales were represented on the Home Office Exports Initiative Steering Group by Surrey Police. In addition, officers from the Cambridgeshire Constabulary, Metropolitan Police, Surrey Police and Wiltshire Constabulary participated in overseas trade exhibitions sponsored by the Initiative.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which (a) police, (b) security and (c) paramilitary forces of foreign governments, were supplied with goods and services under the Home Office Exports Initiative; and what consideration was given to the human rights record of governments concerned. [20030]

Mr. Michael: Information abut the goods and services exported by companies assisted by the Home Office Exports Initiative is not available. I am informed that where a licence was required for the supply of goods or services under the Initiative, it would have been issued only if that was consistent with the Government's policy at the time.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what basis companies were chosen to participate in the Home Office Exports Initiative; and if he will publish the criteria which were used to evaluate the suitability of companies to participate in the Initiative. [20020]

Mr. Michael: I am informed that the services of the Home Office Export Promoter and activities sponsored by the Initiative were open to all companies in the policing and security sector.

Public Order Act

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions have been recorded under (a) section 4a and (b) section 5 of the Public Order Act 1986 in the last year for which figures are available; [20300]

Mr. Michael: In 1996, the number of convictions under sections 4a and 5 of the Public Order Act 1986 were 295 and 14,944 respectively.

Community Service and Combination Orders

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many community service orders were imposed in respect of offenders (a) aged 15 to 17 years and (b) aged 17 to 21 years old in the last year for which figures are available. [20291]

(2) how many combination orders were imposed in respect of offenders (a) aged 15 to 17 years and (b) aged 17 to 21 years in the last year for which figures are available. [20292]

Mr. Michael: Community Service Orders and Combination Orders are available only for offenders aged 16 or over.

Information for 1996 is given in the table.

Number of persons sentenced to Community Service Orders and Combination Orders by age-group, 1996

England and Wales

	Age-group
	16–17	18–21
Community Service Order	3,719	1,312
Combination Order	11,569	4,796

Compensation Orders

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many compensation orders have been made in respect of (a) under 17-year-old, (b) 17 to 21 year old and (c) over 21-year-old offenders in the last year for which figures are available; [20297]

(2) what assessment he has made of the use of compensation orders by the courts. [20298]

Mr. Michael: Ninety-four thousand eight hundred offenders were ordered to pay compensation orders in 1996, two per cent. more than in 1995 but fewer than the 1991 total of 112,800.

In 1996, of the 94,800 offenders ordered to pay compensation orders, 17,400 were aged 10 to 17, 17,900 were aged 18 to 20 and 59,500 were aged 21 and over.

Crime Concern

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the youth action groups promoted by Crime Concern. [20294]

Mr. Michael: This Government consider the Youth Action Initiative to be an excellent model of how to involve young people in dealing with issues of disorder and anti-social behaviour which this Government are determined to tackle. We strongly support the wider expansion of the initiatives.

Youth Action Group is encouraged to tackle problems of relevance to young people, such as graffiti, vandalism, bullying in schools, personal safety and substance abuse. The best of such Groups have an impact, not only on their schools, but on the wider community. Youth Action Groups provide young people with an opportunity to be part of the solution to crime and not just part of the problem. The remarkable achievements demonstrated by winners of the Prudential Youth Action Awards in recent years demonstrate the potential of young people when given that opportunity. I am very keen to ensure that the work of the Youth Action Groups is linked closely to that of the new statutory partnerships for preventing crime and disorder which will be established once the Crime and Disorder Bill takes effect. I am currently looking at ways in which this objective can be achieved.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reduce the number of experiments on animals. [20137]

Mr. George Howarth: We announced on 6 November that we had secured an end to the testing of finished cosmetic products; that we will be exploring a ban on the use of animals for testing ingredients intended for "vanity" products; and that we will be phasing out the use of ascitic animals in monoclonal antibody production.

The Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 requires that the suffering of animals and the number of animals used in individual programmes of work be minimised. It does not provide a mechanism for guaranteeing a year-on-year reduction in the number of animals used. Reductions are best achieved by the development, validation and implementation of alternatives.

To this end, we are exploring ways to promote the development and greater use of alternatives. We are seeking advice from the Animal Procedures Committee, the European Centre for the Validation of Alternative Methods (ECVAM) and others about the establishment of a database on alternative methods. We have also increased the budget, which we make available to the Animal Procedures Committee to sponsor research on alternatives, from £182,000 in 1997–98 to £259,000 in 1998–99.

We are encouraging regulators both in the United Kingdom and through Europe to review the need to use animals in regulatory safety testing.

Rural Crime

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what initiatives he proposes to reduce crime in villages and small towns. [20136]

Mr. Michael: The Government recognise that rural communities have very different needs to urban communities. Whilst they suffer from most of the same types of crime as urban areas, there are also those crimes which are particular to the countryside, such as theft of livestock and farm equipment.

Due to the geographical nature of the countryside, police responses to incidents of crime cannot always be as quick as they and the public would like. Because of this, there is an onus on people to take precautions against becoming victims of crime. There are now many excellent partnership schemes which have developed between the police and the local communities and the creation of many, and diverse, "Watch" schemes is testimony to their success.

The provision for new statutory duties for local authorities and the police jointly to analyse and identify local problems of crime and disorder in the Crime and Disorder Bill will enhance those schemes already in existence. With input from local communities, a strategy will be drawn up and implemented to tackle those problems. This will provide an opportunity to take stock of the crime problems of both rural and urban areas.

Ministerial Group on the Family

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how often the Ministerial Group on the family will meet. [20318]

Mr. Michael: The group has met four times to date. It will meet again as necessary to take forward its work, which consists of looking at a wide range of issues concerned with family policy as part of the Government's manifesto commitment to strengthening family life.

Burglary and Theft

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many recorded theft and burglary offences there were in England and Wales in (a) 1994, (b) 1995, (c) 1996 and (d) 1997 to date; and if he will make a statement. [20316]

Mr. Michael: The information requested is given in the table.

Offences of theft and burglary recorded by the police
England and Wales

Year	Theft	Burglary
1994	2,564,608	1,256,682
1995	2,452,109	1,239,484
1996	2,383,946	1,164,583
January–June 1997	1,107,949	537,189

Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what outside authority visits the Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre to observe the conditions in that establishment; when the last visit took place; what reports and recommendations were sent to the appropriate Home Office department; and if he will make a statement. [20622]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: While there is no statutory provision for the inspection of immigration detention centres by the Chief Inspector of Prisons, Judge Tumim inspected Harmondsworth Detention Centre in November 1988 at the invitation of the then Home Secretary. Judge Tumim's subsequent report was published in March 1989 and made a number of recommendations which, with only one exception, have all been implemented. The provision of a multi-gym has not been possible because of a lack of suitable accommodation.

The Chief Inspector of Prisons, Sir David Ramsbotham, has inspected both Campsfield House and Tinsley House Detention Centres in the past year, and intends to conduct a full inspection of Harmondsworth Detention Centre in his 1998–99 programme.

An independent body, the Harmondsworth Visiting Committee, also provides reports for the Home Secretary on the detention centre. Established in 1990, the Harmondsworth Visiting Committee's members are appointed by the Home Secretary and are drawn from a variety of different ethnic, cultural and occupational backgrounds. The Committee's function is to satisfy itself about the administration of the centre, the upkeep of the premises, and the centre's facilities for the care and treatment of detainees. The last such visit made by the Committee was on 10 December 1997. Matters arising from these visits are discussed the same day with members of Group 4 Total Security Limited and the Detention Management Unit of the Immigration Service.

Visiting Committee members have access to the Detention Centre and detainees at all times and can raise any matters of concern, either with the Immigration Service or direct with the Home Secretary. The Committee meets formally once a month and submits an annual report to the Home Secretary on the state of the Centre and its administration. This report may include the provision of any advice or suggestions considered appropriate.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the daily schedule of activities that people held at the Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre are allowed to follow each day; and if he will list the activities. [20620]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: A full time amenities officer is employed at Harmondsworth Detention Centre and she prepares and publishes a schedule of activities available in the centre. Detainees may attend or participate in as many of the activities as they wish. Organised activities to date have included:

Art Classes
Badminton
Battleships
Bingo
Boules
Card Games
Chess
Chess Competitions
Craft Afternoons
Cricket
Dice Games
Dominoes
Draughts
Football
Football Competitions
Games Evenings
Jenga
Logic Games
Mindtrap
Music Evenings
Needlecraft
Scrabble Competition
Table tennis
Table Tennis Competitions
Table football
Table Football Competitions
Treasure Hunt
Video Game Competitions
Volleyball
Volleyball Competitions.

Detainees are also encouraged to organise their own activities and, in addition to the amenities listed, have access to jigsaw puzzles, playing cards and board games. They also have access to television sets, with both terrestrial and satellite channels, and a video recording machine is available for detainees to watch their own approved foreign language material. A selection of newspapers and books in various languages is provided.

English lessons are given at the Centre twice a week. A room has been set aside for multi-denominational private prayer, and larger prayer meetings are held regularly and attended by visiting clergy.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the present clothes washing facilities that exist at the Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre; and when these facilities were last inspected. [20621]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: A washing machine and tumble dryer are provided in each of the two buildings at Harmondsworth Detention Centre for the use of detainees. Hand washing facilities are also available. Washing powder is provided free of charge.

The machines are tested annually for electrical safety and were last inspected in April 1997. Should any fault be reported on any of the machines, an engineer is called to carry out the necessary repairs.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which organisation is responsible for the running of the Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre; and to whom it reports within his Department. [20592]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Group Four Total Security Limited are employed under contract by the Home Office to undertake the day-to-day supervision and care of immigration detainees held at the Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre. Overall management of the centre is undertaken on site by staff of the Detention Management Unit, which is part of the Immigration Service Enforcement Directorate.

Firearms

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Lambeth firearms amnesty conducted by the Metropolitan Police. [20618]

Mr. Michael: The local amnesty held in Lambeth during the month of November was a great success with 24 firearms in total being surrendered. This consisted of 16 handguns, four shot guns, two rifles and two air weapons. In addition, four imitation firearms and a canister of pepper spray were also surrendered. A large amount of ammunition was also handed in. The streets of South London are a little safer as a result of this initiative.

This was the first local, as opposed to national, amnesty to have been held and had the strong support of the local community and the Metropolitan Police. The number of items handed in during the local amnesty compares with only two guns handed in in Lambeth during the last national amnesty. We will continue to endorse similar initiatives in the future which have the same level of community and police support.

Citizenship Applications

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time taken between receipt of an application for British citizenship and a decision being made. [20481]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 12 December 1997]: We do not record the time taken between receipt of an application and a decision being made, but do record the time taken from receipt to a certificate being issued. As at 30 November 1997, the average length of time was 14.9 months.

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the names of all those people whom he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed, and whether they receive remuneration. [19975]

Mr. Straw: I will write to my hon. Friend with the information as soon as possible. A copy will be placed in the Library.

Millennium Compliance

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department has current dealings with (a) non-governmental organisations and (b) suppliers which are not millennium compliant; and on what date his Department will cease to deal with (i) non-governmental organisations and (ii) suppliers which are not millennium compliant. [20526]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The Home Office is currently in the process of assessing whether its suppliers are millennium compliant. The Home Office's policy is to ensure that contractual obligations are met by the contracted supplier. If they were unable to do so due to their millennium non-compliance, we would assess whether to terminate their contract.

Contracts with suppliers will be judged on their own merits taking into consideration the nature and scope of the contract, and the effect non-compliance has on delivery of the goods or services required by the Department (especially when they are of a strategic nature).

Departmental Staff

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) special advisers, (b) task force members and (c) review body members his Department employs; what is the total salary and benefits of (a) to (c); and what was the equivalent cost prior to 1 May. [19317]

Mr. Sraw: My Department employs two special advisers and one expert special adviser working part-time on the Task Force on youth justice. We have not employed any review body members. In order to protect the privacy of the individuals concerned, details of salaries cannot be provided. Information on the total paybill for special advisers was, however, provided in the answers which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave to the hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) on 25 November 1997, Official Report, columns 472–73.

Policing (Party Conference)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much special grant will be paid to the Dorset Police Authority towards the cost of the policing of the Conservative Party Conference in Bournemouth in October 1998. [20566]

Mr. Michael: My right hon. Friend has authorised an additional payment of police grant to Dorset Police Authority of up to £750,000 in 1998–99 as a contribution to the costs of safeguarding national security at the Conservative Party conference. A similar sum is being made available to Lancashire Police Authority in respect of next year's Labour Party Conference in Blackpool.

Prisons (Drugs)

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) successful and (b) unsuccessful attempts to smuggle class A or B drugs into prisons were discovered in the most recent year for which figures are available; how many criminal prosecutions followed; and what penalties were imposed. [20963]

Mr. George Howarth: Information is not collected centrally in this detail. But in the 12 months ending 30 November 1997, a total of 1,211 people visiting prisons were arrested by the police in connection with possible drug-related offences. The Prison Service does not record what action was subsequently taken by the police.

Prisons (Young People)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy in respect of the detention of youths aged 15 to 17 years within adult prisons. [20679]

Ms Quin: The Government's policy is to accommodate offenders under 18 sentenced to Detention in young offender institutions. Exceptionally, they may be accommodated in prison on an individual and temporary basis. Most unsentenced young offenders aged under 18 are held in specialised remand facilities alongside young offender institutions but some are accommodated separately from adults in adult prisons. The Prison Service is currently considering the setting up of establishments for male juveniles only.

The Government are reviewing the juvenile secure estate as part of the comprehensive spending review.

Correspondence

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what he expects to reply to the letters of 31 July, 18 September and 12 November from the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam concerning Cherny Ntamntambo. [20707]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have written to the hon. Member today.

Stephen Lawrence

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the report by the Police Complaints Authority on their investigation of the complaints against the Metropolitan Police concerning the murder of Stephen Lawrence. [21031]

Mr. Straw: I am today laying before Parliament the report submitted to me by the Police Complaints Authority. This has been made under section 97(2) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which allows the Authority to make a report to the Secretary of State on any matters coming to its notice to which it considers that his attention should be drawn by reason of their gravity or other exceptional circumstances.

The report sets out the main findings resulting from an investigation carried out by officers from Kent Constabulary, under the supervision of the Police Complaints Authority, into the way in which the Metropolitan Police Service handled the murder of Stephen Lawrence.

The report concludes that the Metropolitan Police Service has committed substantial resources over several years to the investigation of this appalling crime, and that there is no doubt that a considerable amount of hard work has been undertaken. The report also concludes that the police operation undertaken immediately after the assault was well organised and effective and that there was no evidence of racist conduct by police officers. The report concludes, however, that there were significant weaknesses, omissions and lost opportunities during the murder investigation. Those errors were not identified by the internal review carried out by the Metropolitan Police. As a result, subsequent attempts to solve the crime have been hampered.

The Metropolitan Police Commissioner has told me that he broadly accepts the findings of this initial report and now awaits the full report from the Kent investigation. He has told me that the Metropolitan Police have moved forward significantly in the investigation of major crime since 1993 but will address all of the shortcomings identified in the supervision and management of this investigation. They will also consider carefully the lessons to be learned.

This report and its conclusion will now be considered by the Inquiry which I have established under the Chairmanship of Sir William Macpherson of Cluny to inquire into the matters arising from the death of Stephen Lawrence in order particularly to identify the lessons to be learned for the investigation and prosecution of racially motivated crimes. The inquiry intends to begin public hearings in February.

The Police Complaints Authority Report also identifies several issues which are relevant to the handling of serious crimes by the police generally. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary and the Crime Committee of the Association of Chief Police Officers are examining national standards in the investigation of major crime with a view to producing a model for the handling of major inquiries. During 1998, the Inspectorate will also be conducting a thematic inspection of major crime investigation across the Police Service.

The Police Complaints Authority Report also draws attention to the shortcomings in first aid skills possessed by the officers who were first to arrive at the scene of the murder. All chief constables have already been recommended to deal with this issue within their forces, by a report of a thematic inspection on officer safety by Her Majesty's Inspectorate which was published in October.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what representations he has received

(2) if he will make a sttaement on the progress of Millennium Commission bids from the east midlands; [19167]

(9) when the proposals for the Asha project were (a) received and (b) evaluated by the Millennium Commission; [20960]

(10) how many projects considered for funding millennium commissioners have visited to date; [20956]

(11) if groups on the Millennium Commission reserve list will be able to proceed to detailed assessment if they so wish; [20955]

(12) in how many languages the Millennium Commission issued their application forms for funding; [20886]

(13) how many meetings officials of the Millennium Commission have had with representatives of the projects considered by the Millennium Commission on 10 December; with which projects they were associated; and on what dates; [20961]

(14) what discussions took place between the Millennium Commission and ethnic minority groups prior to the change of criteria to encourage more ethnic minority groups to put forward applications; [20884]

(15) if he will publish the number of people of Asian origin who are employed at the Millennium Commission and the grade at which they are employed; [20950]

(16) if the Swaminarayan Hindu Mission's project Akshardham can proceed to detailed appraisal; [20885]

(17) how much funding was allocated to ethnic minority projects by the Millennium Commission at its meeting on 10 December. [20949]

Mr. Chris Smith: This is a matter for the Millennium Commission. I shall write to my hon. Friend in my capacity as Chairman of the Commission and place copies of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

Terrestrial Television

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he will announce the outcome of his review into the listing of sports events for broadcast on domestic terrestrial television. [20380]

Mr. Chris Smith: I expect the advisory group to make its recommendations to me on the content of the list before Easter 1998, and I hope to announce the outcome of the review shortly thereafter.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received in respect of the listing and de-listing of sports events for terrestrial television. [20378]

Mr. Chris Smith: I have received 776 representations on this subject since the review of the content of the list was announced in May, including 28 representations from hon. Members. The majority of these representations concerned the television coverage of particular sports events.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he last met Lord MacLaurin to discuss the listing of cricket for broadcast on terrestrial television. [20379]

Mr. Chris Smith: When I met Lord MacLaurin on 18 August, he raised the question of the inclusion of Test cricket among the events listed under Part IV of the Broadcasting Act 1996. I shall be meeting him again on 18 December. The England and Wales Cricket Board has also been consulted as part of my review, and its response will be made available to the advisory group assisting me in that review.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the Government's policy in respect of the listing of sports events for terrestrial television. [20381]

Mr. Chris Smith: I announced the criteria to be used to guide the review on 25 November. An advisory group is considering the events currently listed, and the additional major sports events announced on that day, against these criteria. As part of the review, I have consulted the rights holders for all the events under consideration; broadcast regulators and other interested parties on the content of the list, and their responses will be made available to the advisory group.

Car Parking

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many car park spaces are provided for his Department's (a) Ministers, (b) employees and (c) visitors in (i) London and (ii) the United Kingdom. [19368]

Mr. Tom Clarke [holding answer 8 December 1997]: The Department has a total of 13 car park spaces; four for Ministerial use and one for use by the Permanent Secretary. The remaining eight spaces are set aside for staff and visitors with medical problems or welfare requirements and contractors working on the premises. All the Department's car park spaces are located in London.

British Library

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list (a) the cost to date and (b) estimated completion cost of the new British Library building at St. Pancras. [19056]

Mr. Fisher [holding answer 8 December 1997]: The total construction project budget for the British Library St. Pancras building is £511.1 million. The expenditure committed to date stands at approximately £505.7 million. However, negotiations continue with some contractors on their final accounts and it is not possible, therefore, to estimate the final outturn for the project until all these accounts have been settled.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many (a) special advisers, (b) task force members and (c) review body members his Department employs; what is the total salary and benefits of (a) to (c); and what was the equivalent cost prior to 1 May. [19308]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department employs one full-time and one part-time Special Adviser. Prior to 1 May the Department of National Heritage employed one full-time Special Adviser. In order to protect the privacy of the individuals concerned it would be inappropriate to reveal their salary details. However the total paybill for Special Advisers was given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in response to the hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) on 25 November 1997, Official Report, columns 472–73.

From time to time my Department sets up task forces, review groups or other informal mechanisms. Normal practice is that non-civil servants on these groups are not employed on a salary basis although occasionally travel expenses may by paid the costs of which are not held centrally. A similar arrangement applied prior to 1 May.

National Sports Council

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proposals (a) he and (b) the Sports Council have evaluated for the Crystal Palace National Sports Centre; and at what costs. [19763]

Mr. Banks: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not evaluated any investment proposals regarding Crystal Palace National Sports Centre.

The English Sports Council is currently in discussions with the London Borough of Bromley, who own the site, representatives of sports organisations and others regarding future sporting provision at Crystal Palace National Sports Centre. A number of proposals are being considered. Any decisions will need to take account of the Centre's Grade II* listing, which I announced last week.

My right hon. Friend and I are kept informed of developments on a regular basis.

Information regarding costs of these considerations is not available.

Sport and Schools

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to co-operate with Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools in respect of his Department's duties in relation to sport in schools; and if he will list the action taken in response to HMCI's findings on sport in schools. [19485]

Mr. Banks: My Department has no official duties in relation to sport in schools but we take a keen interest in this area. We have regular contact with the Department for Education and Employment to discuss matters of mutual concern and HMCI's findings form a valuable basis for our discussions.

Athletics Facilities (Wembley)

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what proposals have been put to him for athletics facilities at the planned new Wembley Stadium; and at what costs. [19762]

Mr. Banks: These are matters for the English Sports Council. I understand the athletics facilities at the new English National Stadium will meet the criteria of the International Amateur Athletics Federation for a world class facility capable of staging major world athletic events. The English Sports Council has agreed a provisional Lottery award of £120 million to the English National Stadium Trust, towards total estimated project costs of £240 million.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Coal Gasification

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment she has made of the feasibility of underground coal gasification as a source of energy. [20666]

Mr. Battle: My Department is participating in a European field trial of underground coal gasification (UCG) as part of our coal R and D programme. This is a joint project involving Spain, Belgium and the UK with substantial financial support from the European Commission's THERMIE Demonstration programme. The total cost of the project which started in 1991 is £14 million and the UK contribution is £1.7 million. The project is due to end next year once the current gasification trials have been completed. Results to date have shown the feasibility of gasifying Western European coals at depths in excess of 500 metres. The gas produced from the present trials had a calorific value of approaching a third that of natural gas. This is better than the gas produced by some clean coal gasification power generation processes and indicates UGC technology may offer a potential energy source for power generation in the future.

The economics of UGC will be evaluated in more detail on completion of the current gasification trials. Underground coal gasification may be an attractive primary energy source in the longer term. It is currently many times more expensive than current gas prices, and likely to remain so for many years even when the technical problems have been overcome. The technology could be used to access coal reserves too deep for conventional mining (both opencast and deep mine). In the longer term it could be used to access the vast reserves of high volatile coal located beneath the North Sea. At least 10 years of R and D work is likely to be needed before underground coal gasification can even be considered to be a commercial option.

Enemy Property

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which other Governments her Department is consulting in preparation of the report on British policy on enemy property during and after the Second World War. [19579]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: While I and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary have not consulted with any other Governments in the preparation of this report, we shall wish to give this further consideration.

Working Time Directive

Mr. Salmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on the Government's policy towards the proposed extension of the Working Time Directive to include the fishing industry and other currently exempt professions. [20651]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The European Commission have issued a White Paper but have not yet made detailed proposals. Each of the sectors excluded from the scope of the Working Time Directive has its own specific characteristics and we will need to look carefully at how subsequent proposals take these into account. Any proposals for legislation must respect our particular concerns, for example, about junior doctors, the offshore oil and gas industry and sea fishing.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Land Mines

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much aid has been given to Egypt in each year since 1967 to assist in the clearance of land mines laid in World War II. [20634]

Clare Short: Mine detection equipment to the value of £500,000 was provided from the overseas aid budget in 1996. A further £100,000 for such equipment has been committed in Financial year 1997–98.

In addition, the Ministry of Defence has, from the early 1980s, provided the Egyptian authorities with copies of all surviving maps of known minefields and supporting information on the types of mines laid and the techniques used by the Commonwealth forces during the war. There have been three visits to Egypt by Royal Engineer Ordnance Disposal officers (in 1981, 1984 and 1994); reconnaissance flights over the area were also conducted by the RAF in 1984. The Ministry of Defence is currently preparing a new version of the map and data package which makes use of advances in technology where possible.

South Africa (Investment)

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what was the budget for the British Investment in South Africa (LETS) Scheme in (a) 1985–86, (b) 1986–87 and (c) 1987–88. [20478]

Clare Short: The total budget for the British Investment in Africa Promotion Scheme to cover both Pre-Investment Feasibility Studies (PIFS) and LETS components is £2 million. Expenditure for the three years was as follows:

1997–98: £275,191 (April–December)

All expenditure has been on the (PIFS) facility.

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans her Department has to simplify the criteria for small firms who make applications to the British Investment in South Africa (LETS) Scheme; and if she will make a statement. [20476]

Clare Short: The British Investment in South Africa Promotion Scheme was reviewed earlier this year and a number of improvements have recently been made to enhance its effectiveness. The Local Employee Training Scheme (LETS) has been made more accessible to smaller firms by reducing the minimum intended investment from £200,000 to £100,000. Firms employing between 10 and 500 employees are eligible to apply for LETS grants to cover 50 per cent. of training costs up to a maximum of £50,000. UK firms which have already received a Pre-Investment Feasibility Study (PIFS) grant and have subsequently invested in South Africa are also now eligible to apply for a LETS grant. A brochure giving details of the improvements made to the Scheme has been issued recently by the British Council, the Scheme managers.

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many grants have been awarded to British businesses for the British Investment in South Africa (LETS) Scheme since its inception. [20477]

Clare Short: The British Investment in South Africa Promotion Scheme, known as BIS, has two components. Twenty-five grants have been awarded for Pre-Investment Feasibility Studies. Only four applications have been received for the Local Employees Training Scheme (LETS). One was rejected, one lapsed and the other two are currently under consideration.

AIDS

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action she (a) is taking (b) proposes to take to control the spread of AIDS in Africa; and what funding her Department provides for such measures; [20382]

Clare Short: The Department is contributing to the international effort through annual grants to UNAIDS which is responsible for co-ordinating the UN response to HIV/AIDS. DFID also works through its bilateral partnerships in many African countries and is funding research which is contributing to the development of new methods of protection against infection such as mircrobicides. For future work, we attach particular importance to making renewed efforts to meet the needs of adolescents.

Bilateral expenditure on HIV/AIDS related activities (including prevention, treatment and care) in Africa in calendar year 1996 was £9.2 million. In addition, DFID's contribution to UNAIDS was £3.5 million. It is not possible to disaggregate the proportion of this spent in Africa. Elements of DFID contributions to the UK Medical Research Council and to multilateral agencies (EU, World Bank, United Nations Population Fund and the International Planned Parenthood Federation) will also be expended on HIV/AIDS related activities in Africa but similarly cannot be disaggregated.

Millennium Compliance

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if her Department has current dealings with (a) non-governmental organisations and (b) suppliers which are not millennium compliant; and on what date her Department will cease to deal with (i) non-governmental organisations and (ii) suppliers which are not millennium compliant. [20520]

Mr. Foulkes: When relevant, the Department will remind non-governmental organisations and suppliers it deals with that they must have systems in place which enable them fully to meet the terms of those agreements and contracts which continue into the new millennium.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Civil Servants (Integration)

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made in integrating civil servants from the formerly separate departments of Transport and the Environment; and if he will make a statement on the policy of integrating formerly separated departmental specialists. [19668]

Mr. Prescott: Good progress has been made.

Single integrated teams covering Personnel, Finance, Communications and Private Office support have been established. Action is being taken to establish single integrated Personnel, Finance and IT systems. The Land-use Planning Directorate has been brought together with the Roads and Local Transport Group, to build on the many linkages between these policy areas. Policies have been put in place to encourage staff to move to areas of work formerly covered by the other Department and two staff at Director General level, one from each former Department, have already exchanged posts.

Single Heads of Profession have been identified and specialists working in central groups, such as lawyers and scientists, have been integrated.

To encourage integrating further and give strategic focus to the new Department, I have agreed the following new aim and objectives:

The aim of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions is to improve the quality of life by promoting sustainable development at home and abroad, fostering economic prosperity and supporting local democracy.

Its main objectives are:

1. To protect and improve the environment, and to integrate the environment with other policies across government and international fora.
2. To offer everyone the opportunity of a decent home and so promote social cohesion, well-being and self-dependence.
3. To promote efficient and integrated transport services across different modes and reduce road traffic growth, in order better to meet the mobility needs of the travelling public and industry.
4. To deliver regulatory and other transport services to the public and industry and to collect taxes efficiently and fairly.
5. To enhance opportunity in rural areas, improve enjoyment of the countryside and conserve and manage wildlife resources.
6. To create a fair and efficient land use planning system that respects regional differences and promotes development which is of high quality and sustainable.
7. To promote a system of elected government in England which responds to the needs of local communities.
8. To enhance economic development and social cohesion throughout England through effective regional action and integrated local regeneration programmes.
9. To secure an efficient market in the construction industry, with innovative and successful UK firms that meet the needs of clients and society and are competitive at home and abroad.
10. To improve health and safety by reducing risks from work activity, travel and the environment.

These objectives may be subject to further review in the light of the outcome of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

Eco-labelling

Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) when Her Majesty's Government introduced the European Union eco-labelling scheme; how it is financed; and what is the total cost of the scheme to date; [19740]

(2) how many (a) product categories and (b) products have been awarded the Eco-label since March 1992; [19908]

(3) if he will make a statement on the publicity given in promoting the Eco-labelling Scheme detailing (a) the form in which publicity has been provided and (b) its cost; [19910]

(4) how many people are employed by the Eco-labelling Board. [19907]

Angela Eagle: The United Kingdom Ecolabelling Board was established in November 1992 to administer the European Union eco-labelling scheme within the United Kingdom. It is financed partly by grant-in-aid from the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the Department of Trade and Industry, and partly by income from application and licence fees. The Board has received a total of £3.5 million in grant-in-aid to date.

Since the launch of the scheme, a total of 12 products in four categories (washing machines, toilet paper, kitchen towels and household paints and varnishes) have been awarded the ecolabel within the United Kingdom.

The Board promotes the scheme through leaflets, newsletters, exhibitions, conferences and press advertising, and has spent a total of £500,000 on promotion to date. The scheme also featured in a number of broader-based advertising campaigns run by the then Department of the Environment in 1996 and early 1997.

The United Kingdom Ecolabelling Board comprises a Chairman and 14 members, all of whom serve part time. They are supported by an executive of seven full-time officers and one part-time officer.

Motor Cycles (Deaf Riders)

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions pursuant to his Answer of 26 November, Official Report, column 553, on motor cycles and deaf riders, if he will state his Department's definition of hearing impaired. [19764]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We are consulting with the Royal National Institute for Deaf Persons and the British Deaf Association about how best to implement the concession we have announced, but it is our broad intention that "hearing impaired" will refer to any person whose hearing capacity is not sufficient to allow them to receive instructions by radio whilst undergoing training on a motor cycle. The application of the concession will be dependent on the needs of individual learner riders.

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the names of all those people whom he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed, and whether they receive remuneration. [19969]

Angela Eagle: The information requested has been placed in the Library of the House.

EU Presidency (Environmental Audit)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to arrange for an environmental audit to be conducted of each six-monthly EU presidency. [20002]

Angela Eagle: The environment is an important theme in the Government's objectives for the UK Presidency of the European Union. The Government are currently considering ways of taking this forward and will make an announcement in due course.

Integrated Transport White Paper

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the integrated transport white paper will be published. [20006]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We are proposing to publish the White Paper on integrated transport policy in spring 1998.

Castle Cement (Bellman Quarry Application)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many representations he received from local residents regarding the Bellman Quarry application by Castle Cement at Clitheroe. [20133]

Mr. Raynsford: Prior to officially notifying the Local Planning Authority on 22 October that he did not wish to call in this planning application, the Secretary of State received 14 representations from 5 local residents and from the Bellman Quarry Action Group.

He subsequently received some 60 representations from Clitheroe residents and some 40 representations from people outside the town.

Four-wheel Drive Vehicles (Off-road Use)

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will assess the advantages of introducing legislation further to control the off-road use of four-wheel drive vehicles in publicly accessible countryside for leisure purposes. [20138]

Angela Eagle: We have been considering the responses to last year's consultation exercise on managing vehicles on rights of way. We intend to make an announcement shortly. Local highway authorities already have powers under the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 to prevent or restrict traffic on rights of way where they cause damage.

Genetically Engineered Oilseed Rape

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the environmental impact of using genetically engineered oilseed rape to produce plastic polymers in leaves and seeds; and if he will make a statement. [20254]

Angela Eagle: Under the current legislation no releases of genetically modified organisms (GMOs) may be carried out without the prior consent of the Secretary of State. To date, no applications for consent to release oilseed rape genetically modified for the production of plastics into the environment have been made. The possibility that development work may continue to field trials in the future has been anticipated by the Department. The release of these genetically modified plants may pose unique risks to human health and the environment which could include toxicity and allergenicity to humans, gene transfer to other oilseed rape crops and effects on other species.

A research contract has been let to the University of Aberystwyth with three aims: to evaluate the current status of development of these novel types of GMOs; to identify particular risks that they pose to human health and the environment; and to recommend risk management procedures. The results of this research, which will be completed in April 1999, will be used by the Department to consider whether consents may be granted for releases of these GMOs into the environment, and what level of management would be necessary to ensure that the risk to human health and the environment is minimised.

Planning Applications

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how many representations he received from local residents in relation to the last planning application he refused as a result of such representations; [20131]

(2) on how many occasions he has used the local representation rule to deny planning permission; and to which schemes he has applied this rule. [20127]

Mr. Raynsford: There is no such thing as "the local representation rule". The views of local residents are among the matters my right hon. Friend takes into account in deciding called-in planning applications or planning appeals. Any decision to grant or refuse planning permission is based on a number of considerations, not simply the local representations received.

Casinos (Health and Safety)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) improvement notices, (b) prohibition notices and (c) prosecutions have been initiated against casinos for breaches or alleged breaches of health and safety legislation in each of the last three years; and how many inspections of casinos for health and safety purposes have been conducted in each of the last three years. [20123]

Angela Eagle: Information in the form requested is not readily available. However the following information is available.

The Health and Safety Executive publishes annual statistical information on local authority enforcement of health and safety. This is organised in seven broad categories, one of these is for Consumer, Leisure and Cultural Services which includes details for enforcement activities in casinos.

The following table provides details of the enforcement action and inspections carried out by local authorities in all Leisure and Cultural Services, including casinos, in each of the last three years.

Year	Preventive inspections[1]	Total inspections[1]	Improvement notices[1]	Prohibition notices[1]	Total notices[1]	Informations laid[2]	Convictions[2]
1993–94	15,000	28,000	780	170	950	23	15
1994–95	16,000	30,000	680	180	860	42	33
1995–96	15,000	29,000	370	140	510	22	12

Eurotunnel (Passenger Lists)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to require Eurotunnel shuttle trains to list individual passengers travelling on their trains. [20401]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have no such plans. Neither, so far as we are aware, do the French Government.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what consultations he has held with Eurotunnel authorities and ferry companies on the implications of the draft directive requiring the listing of each passenger travelling across the English Channel. [20400]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Transport Council in June reached political agreement on a draft Directive requiring the listing of passengers on sea services of more than 20 miles within the European Union. We have since consulted the shipping and ports industries informally on which services might justifiably be exempted from such a requirement and on how the requirement might most conveniently be implemented. Formal consultation will be undertaken on the draft regulations which would transpose the draft Directive into UK law.

Stena Invicta

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of the report of the evacuation trial of the Stena Invicta in January 1996; [20595]

(2) what recommendations were put forward following the evacuation trial of the Stena Invicta in January 1996. [20596]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: A copy of the report, published by the Marine Safety Agency on 20 May 1996, will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The report contains four recommendations which appear on pages 29 and 30. These cover development of additional guidance on emergency procedures; investigation of why some liferafts inflated very slowly during the test evacuation; examination of launching procedures to ensure an uninterrupted supply of liferafts; and further investigation of ferry evacuation times, using formal safety assessment techniques where appropriate.

Ferries

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if ferries operating from United Kingdom ports are required to have self-righting inflatable life rafts. [20601]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: In accordance with the 1995 amendments to the Safety of Life at Sea (SOLAS) Convention, either self righting liferafts or canopied reversible liferafts must be fitted to all new ro-ro passenger ferries after 1 July 1998 and to existing ships at their first periodical survey after 1 July 2000.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those ferries operating to and from United Kingdom ports which meet the SOLAS 90 and SOLAS 95 standards and the dates that they are expected to comply with these standards. [20598]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The SOLAS '90 stability requirements were overtaken by the requirements of the Stockholm Agreement which came into force on 1 April 1997. The Agreement, allowed under a resolution adopted by the 1995 Conference to amend the SOLAS Convention, specifies a stability standard for ferries operating to and from ports in North West Europe and the Baltic Sea, higher than that specified in the revised Convention for application worldwide. The Marine Safety Agency (MSA) published a list showing compliance dates on 1 April 1997. Other 1995 amendments to the SOLAS Convention, not related to stability, are currently being implemented in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list all accidents involving United Kingdom-registered ferries during the last three years. [20597]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The Marine Accident Investigation Branch, which was established in 1989, investigates accidents to United Kingdom ships or other vessels in United Kingdom territorial waters. If appropriate, a report of the investigation is published. Two reports have been published of investigations of accidents involving UK registered ferries in the last three years, as follows:

Nature of accident	Ferry company	Date of accident
Stranding	Stena Sealink	19 September 1995
Heavy weather damage	P and O Euro Ferries (Portsmouth)	14 December 1995

Other accidents to ferries which have been subject to inspectors' investigation in the same period are:

Nature of accident	Ferry company	Date of accident
Heavy weather damage	P and O Euro Ferries (Felix) Ltd.	21 February 1996
Collision and contacts	Red Funnel Group	9 March 1997

Other more minor accidents have also been reported to MAIB during the period.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those ferries operating to and from United Kingdom ports which meet the safety standards set down in the Stockholm Agreement; and, for those that do not meet the standards, what the date is for compliance. [20599]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The list was published on 1 April 1997. A revised list will be published, following the current ferry refit season, on 1 April 1998.

Estonia

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he proposes to take following the publication of the report into the 'Estonia' disaster. [20600]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: We have just received a copy of the report. Our initial assessment is that all of its recommendations have already been addressed by the 1995 amendments to the Safety of Life at Sea (SOLAS) Convention. When we have completed consideration, we will discuss with European colleagues whether any further action is necessary for suggestion to the International Maritime Organisation (IMO).

The report also acknowledges that the problem of water on the car deck has already been addressed by the Stockholm Agreement of which the UK is a signatory.

Marine Safety

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to implement the recommendation contained in the Donaldson Report relating to guidance given by masters on safety margins relating to bad weather. [20482]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Recommendation 51(c) of the Report of Lord Donaldson's Inquiry states that the UK Government should seek to ensure that safety margins are respected by seeking, through international bodies, to persuade all shipowners both to issue guidance on safety margins and to monitor regularly Masters' compliance with it. This has been implemented. The International Safety Management (ISM) Code will require shipping companies to develop, implement and maintain a safety management system. Following consultation with industry, the Marine Safety Agency issued a Merchant Shipping Notice in May 1995, detailing voluntary certification under the ISM Code to apply in advance of its mandatory application from 1 July 1998.

Railtrack

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will call for a report on the Railtrack TOWS system in respect of (a) its safety and (b) noise pollution; and if he will make a statement. [20154]

Ms Glenda Jackson: TOWS (Track Operating Warning System) is an essential piece of equipment to protect staff working on or near railway tracks by providing an audible warning. It is generally installed in settings where other methods such as posting a look-out would be dangerous. It is switched on as necessary by staff who are going to work on the track protected by the system and turned off when leaving the site. When it is not reasonably practicable to stop trains running before carrying out routine inspection or maintenance work, TOWS is the preferred system used for ensuring staff safety.

I am advised by the Health and Safety Executive's Railway Inspectorate that TOWS emits sound at a level necessary for its function and HSE is not aware of any widespread concern over any ancillary noise nuisance, which would be a matter of the Local Authority to purse. I see no need to call for a report on TOWS.

Parish Councils

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will increase the threshold above which parish councils must have their accounts audited by the nominees of the district council. [20896]

Mr. Raynsford: We have no plans to change the arrangements for the audit of parish councils' accounts.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received from parish councils regarding the choice of auditors for their accounts; and if he will make it his policy to allow parish councils to choose their own auditors from a nominated list held by the Audit Commission. [20897]

Mr. Raynsford: We have received some representations from small parish councils about the cost of audit following the changes introduced by the Accounts and Audit Regulations in 1996. We have no plans to amend the current parish audit arrangements which conform to good audit practice, including that of the auditor's appointment being made independently of the body subject to audit.

Airports

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what criteria are used by his Department in determining whether to grant transatlantic fifth freedom rights from regional airports. [20813]

Ms Glenda Jackson: When considering the strategy for air services negotiations, in which the granting of transatlantic fifth freedom rights from regional airports might be an issue, the Department takes into account the needs of consumers, airports, the UK carriers and the overall UK economy.

Transport Expenditure

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will place in the Library copies of all the bids by eligible local authorities in England for transport supplementary grant in 1998–99; [20563]

(2) what is the total sum of bids made in this year's bidding round for expenditure on local authority capital transport schemes for each of the next three years. [20564]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information requested by the hon. Member has been placed in the Library. Total bids for 1998–99 amount to £1.69 billion. Under the TPP system bids are invited for one year's expenditure at a time. In this year's round local authorities have therefore not been asked to bid further ahead than 1998–99. They may quote forecasts of expenditure on major projects for later years, but these figures are generally no more than a guide.

Road Accidents (A38)

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many accidents have been reported on the A38 between Lichfield and Sutton Coldfield in each of the last 15 years; and how many fatalities have resulted. [20553]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information requested is in the table.

Accidents and fatalities on the A38 between Lichfield and Sutton Coldfield: 1982–96

Accidents/casualties

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many accidents have been reported on the A38 on or near the junction with the A5 at Weeford in each of the last 15 years; and how many fatalities have resulted. [20554]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information requested is on the following table.

Car Use (Inner London)

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to introduce charges for the use of cars within inner London. [20557]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Both our national transport consultation document "Developing an Integrated Transport Policy" and the London governance Green Paper "New Leadership for London", raised the issue of using the price mechanism to influence travel choice, including the possibility of charging for road use.

We are looking with an open mind at the advantages and disadvantages of the full range of options for influencing travel choice, and considering the potential economic and social impact of new policies. However, no decisions have yet been taken about what either the London Governance White Paper (due to be published in March) or the Integrated Transport White Paper (which will follow later in the Spring) will say on this issue. Any new compulsory charging regimes would require primary legislation before they could be implemented.

Energy Saving Trust

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the budget for the Energy Saving Trust in (a) 1996–97 and (b) 1997–98. [20648]

Angela Eagle: In 1996–97, my Department provided £25,000,000 in grant funding for the Energy Saving Trust. Funding of up to £19,000,000 has been made available for 1997–98.

Air Services

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will instruct his officials to open negotiations with the Malaysian Government in order to secure direct air services between Manchester and Kuala Lumpur before the 1998 Commonwealth Games. [20816]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The operation of direct air services between Manchester and Kuala Lumpur is a matter for the commercial judgment of the designated carriers of the two countries. We would consider any request for talks to review the present air services arrangements.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the advantages and disadvantages of a mandate being given to the Commissioner of the European Union to negotiate bilateral air service agreements with other countries. [20733]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The UK supported the mandates granted by the Transport Council to the European Commission to negotiate aviation agreements with Norway and Sweden in 1990, with Switzerland in 1995 and with ten central and eastern European (CEE) countries in 1996 (Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Estonia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Romania, Slovakia and Slovenia). The Commission's negotiations with Switzerland and with the CEE countries are continuing. We would welcome the extension of the aviation single market to these countries, provided there is no distortion of competition or dilution of safety standards. This should increase opportunities for UK travellers, UK airlines and UK airports, leading to greater choice and lower fares.

In 1996 the UK was isolated in opposing the granting of a limited mandate to the Commission to enter into preliminary discussions with the US on a possible regulatory framework for EC/US air services. The Commission's subsequent request for a mandate for comprehensive negotiations with the US including market access is currently under discussion in Brussels, but several Member States, including the UK, have expressed doubts about the practicability of the Commission's proposal. Our priority objective is to bring our current bilateral negotiations with the US to a successful conclusion, which would bring benefits for travellers in the UK and throughout the Community.

We would consider any future proposal for authorising the Commission to negotiate air services agreements with third countries on their merits.

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what specific (a) quantified and (b) unquantified factors are used by the CAA to assess regional economic benefits in its economic analysis prepared before air service negotiations. [20815]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The quantified and unquantified factors used by the CAA to assess regional benefits in its economic analyses are set out in a paper CAP638 "The Economic Impact of New Air Services", published in November 1994. I am arranging for copies of this document to be placed in the House Library.

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reasons his Department has not agreed to allow Air Jamaica rights to operate passenger flights to Manchester Airport. [20814]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Air Jamaica has not applied for flights to Manchester this season.

Vehicle Approval Test

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the percentage of American cars currently being driven legally in the United Kingdom which would fail the proposed single vehicle approval test; and if he will make a statement. [20710]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Such an assessment is not necessary. When SVA is introduced, it will apply only to vehicles first registered in Great Britain after the appointed date. Vehicles already licensed and registered will not be affected.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the compatibility of the proposed single vehicle approval test with EU rules on the free movement of goods; what representations he has received from the Commissioner for Transport on the matter; and if he will make a statement. [20708]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Single Vehicle Approval is not harmonised at European level. Nevertheless, our proposals took full account of our obligations under the Treaty of Rome, and the proposed arrangements are similar to schemes operating in some other member states. The European Commission has instructed us to defer implementing the proposals set out in our recent consultation. This instruction is part of a legal procedure that governs the making of technical regulations which have trade implications within the EU. We remain confident that the British SVA scheme does not have any adverse effect on the internal market, whilst removing barriers to trade with other parts of the world. A further announcement will be made when discussions with the Commission have been concluded.

London Government

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what academic studies have been commissioned by the Government Office for London into alternative electoral systems for the election of a London Mayor and a London Assembly. [20392]

Mr. Raynsford: The Government Office for London has commissioned a report about election of the London Mayor and the London Assembly—the Greater London Authority—from Professor Patrick Dunleavy (LSE) and Dr. Helen Margetts (Birkbeck College). When we receive the final version of their report a copy will be placed in the Library.

WALES

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the names of all those people who he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed, and whether they receive remuneration. [19972]

Mr. Ron Davies: The information requested is contained in the publication "Appointments by the Secretary of State for Wales" which is available in the House of Commons Library. The information is updated quarterly.

Church Accountability

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to increase the parliamentary accountability of the Church of Wales. [20130]

Mr. Ron Davies: The Church of Wales is accountable to its Governing Body. I have no intention of seeking to alter this position.

Departmental Wages

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what are the hourly rates of pay for full-time employees in his Department in the range of £4.39 an hour to £3.17 an hour; and how many people receive each such hourly rate of pay in each region defined by the boundaries of the regional government offices. [20603]

Angela Eagle: A total of 1,351 full-time employees can earn between £4.39 an hour and £3.17 an hour.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many full-time employees in his Department are paid at an hourly rate of between (a) £3.30 and £3.50, (b) £3.51 and £3.75 and (c) £3.76 and £4. [20611]

Mr. Ron Davies: The number of full-time employees, including casual staff, on 30 November 1997, based on gross hours of 42 hours per week is as follows:

(a) 203

(b) 39

(c) 79

Figures exclude staff in CADW.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Electricity Deregulation

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will provide a breakdown of how the rebate of £45 million resulting from the deregulation of the electricity industry in Northern Ireland has been spent. [19513]

Mr. Ingram: The Government announced on 25 November 1997 that £5 million of the remaining £45 million Government support for electricity consumers was to be allocated to an expansion of the Domestic Energy Efficiency Scheme. The annual target number of homes of the elderly and low income families to be insulated and/or draughtproofed under the Scheme is to be increased from 14,000 to 20,000, creating an estimated 40 new jobs in the process. Consideration is being given as to how best the remaining £40 million might be spent on measures to help electricity consumers in Northern Ireland. I hope to make an announcement in the near future.

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will publish the names of all those people she has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed and whether they receive remuneration. [19981]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have placed in the Library a list of those individuals who have been appointed to public bodies in Northern Ireland in the period 1 May to 5 December 1997, with details of their position and whether they receive remuneration.

Violence against Women

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what EU initiatives she proposes relating to violence against women. [19911]

Mr. Worthington: I am aware that the European Women's Lobby is proposing to hold a conference for non-governmental organisations on domestic violence during the UK Presidency of the European Union. I welcome this and will try to support it in whatever way I can. In my view, Northern Ireland would be an ideal location for such an event. The Northern Ireland Regional Forum on Domestic Violence and the more recent local networks provide a good model for effective inter-agency working in this field. We are bringing forward new legislation to strengthen and extend the law in Northern Ireland to protect women from domestic violence.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will publish details of the goods and services provided by the RUC under the Home Office Exports Initiative. [20010]

Mr. Michael: I have been asked to reply.

The Royal Ulster Constabulary played no part in the Home Office Exports Initiative.

Dr. David Clark: The Cabinet Office (Office of Public Service), employs two special advisers, and I refer the hon. Member to my earlier replies to the hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) on 25 November 1997, Official Report, columns 472–73, for details of the total paybill for all special advisers.

The Better Regulation Task Force reports to the Cabinet Office (Office of Public Service), and has fifteen external members. All members are unpaid apart from their travel expenses, as was the case before 1 May 1997[1].

[1] It is not possible to distinguish the cost of officials' time spent on Task Force and Review related work.

Open Government

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the Government's policy in respect of Open Government. [20403]

Dr. David Clark: Our proposals for opening up government with a radical Freedom of Information Act are set out in the White Paper "Your Right to Know" (Cm 3818) which I presented to the House on 11 December 1997.

Special Advisers

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if a special adviser in his Department has made unauthorised disclosures of information regarding the Government White Paper on Freedom of Information. [20880]

Dr. David Clark: Neither of my special advisers has made any unauthorised disclosure of information regarding the White Paper on Freedom of Information "Your Right to Know".

I gave clear instructions to my Department that contracts with the media in the run-up to the publication of the White Paper should not go beyond matters already in the public domain, and my special advisers acted fully in conformity with those instructions.

Millennium Compliance

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if his Department has current dealings with (a) non-governmental organisations and (b) suppliers which are not millennium compliant; and on what date his Department will cease to deal with (i) non-governmental organisations and (ii) suppliers which are not millennium compliant. [20524]

Mr. Kilfoyle [holding answer 12 December 1997]: In accordance with the guidelines produced by the CCTA in September 1996, all new contracts between my Department and non-governmental organisations and suppliers for systems, goods or services that might be adversely affected by non-compliance now include a clause on millennium compliance. For contracts for such products which were already in existence, plans are in place and remedial work is in hand to ensure that any systems, goods or services provided by these non-governmental organisations or suppliers will be millennium compliant in good time.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Civil Justice Reform

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list those insurers who have to date agreed to support the Lord Chancellor's reforms of the civil justice system; and if he will provide insurance for litigants acting under conditional fees arrangements. [20681]

Mr. Hoon: While the Lord Chancellor, myself and officials have had discussions with insurers about insurance for conditional fee agreements, we have not thought it necessary to seek the support of these, or any other, insurers for the proposed reforms to the civil justice system.

The provisions of insurance must be a matter for insurers. As I have told the hon. and learned Gentleman before, the insurance industry has reacted positively to the proposal to extend the conditional fees scheme and we have been encouraged by the creative approach being taken to developing affordable products.

Legal Aid

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list those insurance companies and brokers with whom he has held discussions since 18 October about his proposals to reform the legal aid system. [20682]

Mr. Hoon: The precise details of meetings arranged since 18 October are as follows: on 29 October officials met representatives of the Association of British Insurers; on 14 November the Lord Chancellor met the Chairman of Abbey Legal Protection Ltd.; on 19 November officials met representatives of Litigation Protection Ltd.; on 2 December the Lord Chancellor met representatives of the ABI, DAS, Abbey Legal Protection, Legal Protection Group, Litigation Protection Ltd., Greystoke Legal Services Ltd., R. E. Brown and others and Lloyd's and Law Club Legal Protection (Cornhill Group); on 3 December officials attended a seminar organised by Abbey Legal Protection; and, on 4 December officials met representatives of Peak Insurance Services. Arrangements are also being made for the first meeting of the working group of insurance industry representatives and officials to be held in the new year.

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will publish the names of all those people whom he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed, and whether they receive remuneration. [19967]

Mr. Hoon: The names of those appointed are listed in the table. There were also two appointments to the Lord Chancellor's Advisory Committee on Appointment of Juvenile Court Lay Panel Members (an NDPB in Northern Ireland): one chairman and one member. These names are not included.

Departmental Wages

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many full-time employees in his Department are paid at an hourly rate of between (a) £3.30 and £3.50, (b) £3.51 and £3.75 and (c) £3.76 and £4. [20610]

Mr. Hoon: This answer covers the Headquarters of the Lord Chancellor's Department (with Associated Offices), the Court Service, Public Trust Office, Land Registry, Public Record Office and Northern Ireland Court Service.

In LCD HQ (with Associated Offices), the minimum hourly rate payable is £3.44 but there are no full-time staff currently in receipt of hourly rates in any of the ranges specified. There are similarly no full-time staff in the Public Trust Office, the Public Record Office or the Northern Ireland Court Service in receipt of hourly rates within any of the ranges. In the Court Service, there are 202 full-time staff (49 permanent, 153 casual) in receipt of hourly rates in the range £3.30–£3.50, none in the range £3.51–£3.75 and one in the range £3.76–£4.00. These figures do not include a negotiated uplift due to take effect for permanent staff in April 1998. In the Land Registry, there is one full-time member of staff in the range of £3.76–£4.00, but no staff in the other ranges.

SCOTLAND

Education (Higher Still)

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many practising secondary school English teachers are members of the Higher Still English Development Group. [19807]

Mr. Wilson: The current Higher Still reference group for English and Communication comprises 8 members, 2 of whom are practising English teachers, with the other members drawn from secondary, further and higher education, Her Majesty's Inspectorate and the Higher Still Development Unit.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the administrative arrangements for Higher Still in English and Communications. [19803]

Mr. Wilson: The Arrangements documents for Higher Still English and Communication, as for other subjects, were issued earlier this year, following an extensive consultation process with the teaching profession. Partnership with the profession has been a key factor throughout the development of the Higher Still Programme and this is continuing as we work towards successful implementation.

Sixth Year Students

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to improve the quality of the Scottish sixth year, both for advanced higher and non-advanced higher students. [20543]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The Higher Still Programme is designed to provide a progressive educational experience leading to meaningful nationally recognised qualifications for all students in Scottish fifth and sixth years. From August 1999 new qualifications will be available to students in schools and colleges at five levels, offering progression from whatever level of prior attainment a student has achieved.

Athletics Coaching

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to ensure the continuation of professional athletics coaching in Scotland. [19774]

Mr. Galbraith: The Scottish Sports Council is continuing to provide support to the Scottish Athletics Federation and has recently entered discussions with the Federation about its plans to introduce a new structure for Scottish athletics from April 1998. These discussions will address a range of issues, including the provision of coaching.

Education Authority Spending

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was average per capita spending in each education authority in primary schools and secondary schools on (a) books and (b) other educational materials and equipment (i) in the current session, (ii) 1994, (iii) 1992, (iv) 1987 and (v) 1977 in constant prices. [19776]

Mr. Wilson: Details of expenditure on schools for the current financial year are not yet available. The information available for the other financial years concerned is given in the following tables which have been compiled from local authority financial returns. Expenditure on other educational materials and equipment was not separately identified before 1982–83. There have been some variations from year to year in the recording of expenditure under these two headings. It is, therefore, possible that some expenditure on books may be included under expenditure on equipment or vice versa.

Students

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a copy of the Regulations currently used to determine student's eligibility for grants or loans. [19801]

Mr. Wilson: The Regulations used to determine Scottish domiciled students' eligibility for a student grant are The Student's Allowances (Scotland) Regulations, 1996 S.I No. 1754 (S.145), as amended by The Education Authority Bursaries and Students' Allowances (Scotland) (Amendment) Regulations 1997, S.I 1997 No. 1049 (S.94). These are supplemented by the booklet "Student Grants in Scotland—A Guide to Undergraduate Students' Allowances". The Regulations governing eligibility for a student loan are The Education (Student Loans) Regulations 1997, S.I 1997 No. 1675, which apply throughout Great Britain.

Copies of the Regulations and the booklet are available in the Library.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the availability of supplementary allowances for students to cover (a) disability, (b) travel, (c) a second home and (d) other costs. [19760]

Mr. Wilson: From academic year 1998–99, the Disabled Students' Allowance will cease to be means-tested and will continue to be available in the form of a grant to all students.

In academic year 1998–99, students who are already in higher education will continue to be able to apply for assistance in the form of supplementary allowances for travel, a second home and other costs until they complete or abandon their present programme of study. Students who enter higher education for the first time in academic year 1998–99 will be eligible for these allowances on the same basis for that year.

The move to 100 per cent. loans for maintenance in academic year 1999–2000 will require some modification of the arrangements for supplementary allowances. We are still considering the details of these arrangements, but we hope to announce our plans shortly.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make the transitional rules for grants or loans apply for all three or four years of the university or college course of entrants in 1998. [19943]

Mr. Wilson: No. The transitional arrangements for new students entering in academic year 1998–99 will apply for that year only. The loan will comprise about 75 per cent. of the maintenance support package and the means-tested grant will account for the balance of about 25 per cent.

From academic year 1999–2000, standard maintenance grants will be replaced by loans. Graduates will be asked to repay the loans only once they are earning more than £10,000 per annum and the level of repayments will be linked to their income.

Teachers

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many secondary and primary school teachers were newly employed by each Scottish education authority on (a) permanent contracts and (b) short term temporary contracts in (i) 1997–98 and (ii) each of the previous three years. [19778]

Mr. Wilson: No figures are yet available for 1997–98 or 1996–97. Information available for the previous three years is given in the tables, in which the figures relate only to contracts of three months or over.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many FTE specialist teachers in primary schools (a) there are in the current session and (b) there were in each of the previous five years in each specialty. [19775]

Mr. Wilson: Information is available only for 1992 and 1994 as in the following table:

Education authority primary schools Number (FTE) of specialist teachers in primary schools[1]

[1] Excludes foreign teachers. Data will next be collected in September 1998.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what new recommendations for the revision of guidelines for the appraisal of teachers have been produced by the National Co-ordinating Committee for the Staff Development of Teachers; and how these will be implemented. [20540]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: I expect to receive the National Co-ordinating Committee's recommendations shortly and to issue new guidelines early next year for incorporation in local authority schemes.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he has taken to ensure that each primary school in Scotland has at least one teacher trained in modern languages. [20541]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: I am continuing the Modern Languages in the Primary School (MLPS) training programme for primary teachers into a fifth phase which will involve 830 teachers. Although in strictly numerical terms sufficient teachers have already been trained to ensure that each Scottish primary school could have at least one trained teacher there are still gaps in provision resulting from staff movement. By the end of school session 1997–98 the total number of teachers trained to teach a modern foreign language to primary school pupils will be around 3,800. Almost £16 million will have been spent on MLPS since the programme began in 1993.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (i) pupils and (ii) FTE teachers in each education authority there were in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools and in each case what was the pupil-teacher ratio in (1) the current session and (2) each of the last five years. [19777]

Mr. Wilson: Information for the current session is not yet available. Information for the previous five years is given in the table.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to encourage the best school teachers to continue as classroom teachers. [20542]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: Successful classroom teachers who lead and inspire our young people should receive recognition and encouragement to continue in their role. Before bringing forward detailed plans, however, I wish to seek the views of interested parties on how that can best be achieved. I have therefore asked the Commission on Scottish Education jointly established by the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the teacher unions to consider the issue. I expect a report in due course.

Millennium Compliance

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if his Department has current dealings with (a) non-governmental organisations and (b) suppliers which are not millennium compliant; and on what date his Department will cease to deal with (i) non-governmental organisations and (ii) suppliers which are not millennium compliant. [20530]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 12 December 1997]: My Department has dealings with a very large number of non-governmental organisations and suppliers of products and services. The Department is keeping the issue of the year 2000 compliance of its suppliers under review as part of its overall year 2000 work programme, in line with guidance provided by the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA).

Undergraduate Courses

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if it is his policy to encourage Scottish universities to give applicants with advanced highers direct entry into the second year of undergraduate courses. [20544]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 12 December 1997]: It is for the higher education institutions themselves to decide whether to admit a student direct to the second year of a degree course on the basis of Advanced Higher passes. The Government are determined to ensure that the potential of the Advanced Higher in improving standards and the quality of the educational experience in the Scottish sixth year is realised and welcome the positive response of the higher education sector to the Higher Still Programme and to the Advanced Higher. The Committee of Scottish Higher Education Principals have indicated that recognition for the Advanced Higher is likely to take a variety of forms.

Departmental Wages

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many full-time employees in his Department are paid at an hourly rate of between (a) £3.25 and £3.50, (b) £3.51 and £3.75 and (c) £3.76 and £4. [20614]

Mr. Dewar: Based on a net working week of 37 hours the information is (a) 1, (b) 226 and (c) 19. A pay offer is currently under consideration by staff in the Scottish Prison Service and if it is accepted the information will be (a) 0, (b) 226 and (c) 9.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the number of United Kingdom fishing vessels which currently regularly work in fisheries (a) one day or less, (b) two days and (c) three days or more sailing time from ports (i) in the north east of Scotland and (ii) on the west coast of Scotland; and if he will make a statement. [20650]

Mr. Dewar: Any reliable estimate would involve disproportionate costs.

Information is collected on the length of fishing trips and the location of fishing activity, but it would require detailed analysis to identify the patterns of such activity for the fleet for a representative period. Vessels may fish in a number of sea areas during a single fishing trip.

Mixed-sex Wards

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many mixed-sex NHS wards there were in Scotland on (a) 1 November, (b) 1 May, (c) 1 November 1996 and (d) 1 November 1995. [20061]

Mr. Galbraith: As the information requested is not available centrally, I shall write to the hon. Member.

HEALTH

Hearing Aids

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how much has been spent by the NHS Supplies Authority in the purchase of hearing aids in each of the last five years; [18362]

(2) how much was spent by the National Health Service in purchasing hearing aids from the NHS Supplies Authority in the last five years for which figures are available. [18363]

Mr. Boateng: The information is set out in the table.

Alzheimer's Disease

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in East Lancashire aged under 60 years have Alzheimer's disease; and what percentage of this number is cared for at home. [19693]

Mr. Boateng: Unfortunately, it is not possible to give my hon. Friend precise information as this is not available. However, a best estimate based on a recent national epidemiological study indicates that the number of sufferers under the age of 60 in East Lancashire would be approximately 80. It is not known what percentage of this number is cared for at home. My hon. Friend may wish to contact the Chairman of East Lancashire Health Authority for further information.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many PFI schemes are currently under consideration; and what the total revenue commitment of the NHS is to these schemes; [19469]

(2) what his estimates are for (a) 1977–98, (b) 1998–99, (c) 1999–2000, (d) and (e) 2000–2001 onwards of total annual revenue commitments of the NHS at a consequence of all PFI schemes entered into to date. [19470]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 9 December 1997]: The Government have prioritised 15 major Private Finance Initiative schemes. The schemes at Dartford and Gravesham NHS Trust and Carlisle Hospitals NHS Trust have already reached financial close and started construction. Information on the revenue consequences of PFI schemes with a capital value under £10 million is not collected centrally.

Details of the unitary charge payable to the private sector in the remaining 13 schemes are being negotiated and therefore commercially confidential until financial close is achieved. We estimate, however, the total revenue commitments on major PFI schemes at 2001–02 will represent less than 0.5 per cent. of revenue spend in the Hospital and Community Health Services.

The estimated unitary payments for the two schemes which have reached financial close are set out in the table.

1. Figures in 1996 prices and are subject to indexation.

2. Payment for a PFI contract does not commence until the hospital is operational. Figures assume that both schemes become operational during 2000–01.

3. The figures assume full availability and performance standards are met throughout.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of revenue and capital charges will be required to service the current PFI projects with a capital value over £10 million. [19862]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 11 December 1997]: A Private Finance Initiative contract is for the provision of a fully serviced hospital facility. A National Health Service trust pays for the service by means of a single unitary payment. The unitary payment includes elements of cost for the provision and maintenance of assets, the supporting facilities management and financing. It is therefore, not appropriate to attempt to disaggregate the price charged for these services.

The annual unitary payments for the two major PFI schemes that have reached financial close are expected to be:

Dartford and Gravesham NHS Trust: £16.6 million

Carlisle Hospitals NHS Trust: £10.9 million.

Steak and Cigarettes (Health Risk)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the health risk of (a) eating one T-bone steak per week and (b) smoking 20 cigarettes a day; and if he will make a statement. [20119]

Ms Jowell: The information is not available in the form requested.

Autism

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many adults diagnosed as autistic when children are in institutions funded by his Department. [20257]

Mr. Boateng: No places are directly funded by the Department of Health and no information is held centrally on the number of adults with autism in institutions. Health and local authorities are responsible for the provision and development of appropriate services in their areas in the light of Departmental guidance. The Department has also funded a number of projects to raise awareness of the needs of people with autism and to help develop good practice.

Hospitals (Meat Supplies)

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that all meat bought for hospitals originates in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [20245]

Ms Jowell: It is for individual National Health Service trusts to decide how they source their meat. About 80 per cent. of trusts in England use NHS Supplies Authority contracts. These do not specify country of origin. NHS Supplies' responsibility is to obtain best value for money for the NHS, while ensuring compliance with European public procurement directives.

Smoking

Mr. MacGregor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the risk of dying from cancer as a result of smoking 10 cigarettes a day. [20473]

Ms Jowell: The assessment requested has not been made specifically for smoking related cancer deaths but the risk of an individual dying in any one year from smoking 10 cigarettes per day (all smoking related diseases) has been estimated as 1:200.

Incontinence

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if incontinence care will be included in the first tranche of services to be covered by the national service frameworks announced in the White Paper, "The New NHS". [20561]

Mr. Boateng: The development of a range of recuperation and rehabilitation services for older people is likely to be included in the first tranche of services to be covered by the national service frameworks as announced in the White Paper, "The New NHS".

Incontinence services play a key role in that range of service provision.

Correspondence

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to reply to the letter of the hon. Member for Spelthorne dated 28 October concerning Mrs. M. Stanford of Sunbury on Thames. [20680]

Mr. Milburn: I have written to the hon. Member today.

Death Statistics

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the death rate from injuries or illnesses relating to (a) motor car accidents, (b) smoking, (c) alcohol and (d) eating BSE infected beef. [20393]

Ms Jowell: Information on death rates is not available in the form requested.

NHS Trusts

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if, following the changes set out in his White Paper, "The New NHS", NHS trusts will still be able to retain funds generated by the sale of assets for the sole use of the trust concerned. [20734]

Mr. Milburn: Under the existing arrangements National Health Service trusts retain the proceeds they generate from the sale of their assets. Whether the trust can spend the cash it has generated is subject to the discretion of the appropriate NHS executive regional office. If, in the view of the regional office, a trust which has generated cash does not have an appropriate use for the money it is allowed to keep the cash but cannot spend it until an appropriate requirement can be identified.

The trust financial regime will be reconsidered in the light of comments on the White Paper. Any changes made as a result will be to ensure that resources are deployed in the most equitable way to maximise benefit to the NHS.

Departmental Wages

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will (a) list the national paybands for full-time staff in his Department which would represent an hourly rate of £4 or less and (b) list by region as defined by the regional government offices the numbers of staff paid at these rates. [20607]

Ms Jowell: The lowest national payband in the Department of Health ranges from £8,000 to £15,750 a year. Because of differences in hours of work, a rate of £4 per hour for London staff equates to an annual salary of £8,561; outside London the figure is £8,770.

	Number of staff
London	9
North East	0
Yorkshire and Humberside	42
East Midlands	12
Eastern	0
South East	3
West Midlands	0
North West	76

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many full-time staff in his Department are paid at an hourly rate of (a) £3.65, (b) between £3.66 and £3.75 and (c) between £3.76 and £4. [20608]

Ms Jowell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 2 December at column 182.

At present, the Department of Health employs 106 full-time members of staff who are being paid an hourly rate of £3.65. There are 15 members of staff who are paid between £3.66 and £3.75 an hour and 23 are paid between £3.76 and £4 an hour.

Carers

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how carers and care users will be able to ensure that they obtain the consistency and quality in the availability of services covered by national service frameworks announced in the White Paper, "The New NHS". [20562]

Mr. Boateng: Representatives of users and carers will be involved in the development of national service frameworks, which will be published documents. Health authorities, National Health Service trusts and Primary Care Groups will agree local health improvement programmes which will set out, among other things, how national service frameworks will be implemented locally. These will also be published documents.

In addition, the White Paper introduces two new national bodies. The National Institute for Clinical Excellence will promote clinical and cost-effectiveness and produce and disseminate clinical guidelines. The Commission for Health Improvement will support and oversee the quality of clinical governance and clinical services.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Departmental Staff

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) special advisers, (b) task force members and (c) review body members his Department employs; what is the total salary and benefits of (a) to (c); and what was the equivalent cost prior to 1 May. [19304]

Mr. Morley: The Department employs two special advisers. Details were set out in the answer given to the hon. Member by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 13 November 1997, Official Report, columns 615–17.

For information on the total paybill for special advisers, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 25 November 1997, Official Report, columns 472–73.

No task force members are employed by the Department.

There are currently two Reviews involving external members, none of whom are paid a salary by the Department. However, the Department does pay an attendance allowance for meetings attended and reimburses reasonable travel and subsistence costs.

It is not possible to distinguish the cost of officials' time spent on Task Force and Review related work.

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the names of all those people whom he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed; and whether they receive remuneration. [19980]

Mr. Morley: Details of all Public Appointments made by my right hon. Friend during 1997 will be published in the 1998 Departmental Annual Report.

Beef

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the quality of the meat imported into the United Kingdom from (a) the Republic of Ireland, (b) the Netherlands, (c) France, (d) Botswana, (e) Namibia and (f) Australia; how the regulations applying to meat from these countries differ from those applying to British beef; and if he will make a statement. [20394]

Mr. Rooker: All fresh meat produced in the UK and imported into the UK from other EU Member States must be produced in accordance with harmonised Community rules laid down in Council Directive 64/433/EEC. Fresh meat imported from third countries must come only from approved establishments in countries which are authorised by the European Commission to export to the Community, which include Botswana, Namibia and Australia. These controls are designed to ensure that the meat satisfies health requirements equivalent to those applying within the Community.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what assessment he has made of the risk of BSE being contained in meat imported into the United Kingdom from (a) the Republic of Ireland, (b) the Netherlands, (c) France, (d) Botswana, (e) Namibia and (f) Australia; and if he will make a statement; [20396]

(2) what assessment he has made of the risk of contracting CJD from BSE contained in meat produced in (a) the Republic of Ireland, (b) the Netherlands, (c) France, (d) Botswana, (e) Namibia, (f) Australia and (g) the United Kingdom. [20395]

Mr. Rooker: BSE has never been detected in meat (muscle) even in clinically affected cattle.

It is not therefore possible to assess accurately the risk of contracting CJD from meat from any source.

SEAC have advised that the most likely source of nvCJD is exposure to BSE before 1989, when the measures to exclude BSE infected tissues from the human food chain were put in place. However, there is, as yet, no conclusive evidence of the route of infection or the infective dose. Nor is it possible to determine whether a single challenge can cause the disease or whether exposure over a period would be necessary to establish the disease.

Given that the incidence of BSE is higher in the UK than elsewhere, it is to be expected that the risk of exposure from offals has historically been greater than in other countries.

BSE has not been reported in Botswana, Namibia and Australia. We therefore consider that the risk of beef imported from those countries carrying BSE infectivity is very small indeed.

BSE has been reported in the Republic of Ireland, the Netherlands and France, but these countries, like the UK, have measures in place which exclude the most ineffective tissues (specified risk material) from the human food chain.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the impact on British farmers of (a) the export ban on British beef and (b) the ban on the sale of meat on the bone. [20397]

Mr. Rooker: It is impossible to establish the direct impact on farmers of the export ban in isolation. The maintenance of the ban is only one of the factors currently contributing to the weakness of the domestic market. However, its impact will in part have been offset by the removal from the market of over 30 months cattle, calves under 20 days of age and beef bought into intervention.

Since only 5 per cent. of beef is currently sold on the bone, the effect on producer returns on the ban on the sale of bone-in beef should be negligible.

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the risk to consumers of CJD infection from eating (a) 1kg of beef on the bone products and (b) 1kg of beef on the bone sourced from a Scottish beef herd. [20503]

Mr. Rooker: Much would depend on the product and which particular bone. If the hon. Member is referring to vertebral column and the risk from dorsal root ganglion, the risk is likely to be greater for products in which the dorsal root ganglion could remain in the food. That would be the case for bone-in beef or for products such as mechanically recovered meat. The use of vertebral column to produce mechanically recovered meat was prohibited in 1995. Another factor which needs to be taken into account is the particular product concerned.

Some products, such as gelatin, involve processes which are known to reduce the level of BSE infectivity and would therefore present a lower risk than other products.

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the representations he has received since he announced the ban on the sale of beef on the bone products; and how many of these representations were in favour of (a) the issuing of a warning on the possible risk from beef on the bone products and (b) a ban on sales of such products. [20504]

Mr. Rooker: All replies received by 4pm on Friday 12 December, in response to the consultation exercise carried out with industry, consumers and interested parties on the bone-in beef proposals, have been carefully considered and assessed. The results of the consultation exercise have been reflected in the legislation which my right hon. Friend is intending to lay before the House today. As is our usual practice, copies of the responses will be deposited in the Library of the House.

Organophosphates

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many licences for the manufacture and sale of organophosphate-based products have been withdrawn; and for what reasons. [20584]

Mr. Rooker: Since 1986, when statutory controls on pesticides were introduced, the approvals of 80 MAFF-approved organophosphate-based pesticide products have been withdrawn for commercial reasons at the request of the company concerned; 11 organophosphate product approvals have been revoked for the failure of the approval-holding company to meet a "data submission deadline" set by Ministers for the company to provide information on the effectiveness (efficacy) of its product; five organophosphate product approvals have been revoked for the failure of an approval-holding company to meet a "data submission deadline" set by Ministers for a company to provide information on some aspect of the safety of its product, in order fully to support the product's new or continuing approval; nine organophosphate product approvals have been revoked for the failure of an approval-holding company to provide information required by Ministers (and supplied by other companies), following a UK review of the data package supporting the active ingredients; two organophosphate product approvals have been revoked following the lapsing of a provisional approval for a particular batch of a product which had been imported by a company into the UK.

No licences or marketing authorisations for organophosphate-based veterinary medicinal products have been withdrawn by the Licensing Authority. Products have been voluntarily withdrawn from the market by licence holders from time to time since the Medicines Act came into force in 1968. Details of the numbers are not readily available and the reasons for withdrawal were matters for the licence holders.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the permitted uses of the organophosphate product Chlorpyriphos; and what assessment of the results of the US Government's research into its carcinogenic properties was taken into account when authorising these uses. [20583]

Mr. Rooker: All pesticides are subject to strict regulatory control and must be approved by Ministers before they may be marketed or used in the United Kingdom. Chlorpyriphos, either by itself or in combination with other pesticide active ingredients, is approved for use in the UK as an insecticide on apples, barley, beetroot, currants, brassicas, carrots, celery, cereal grain, fennel, forestry, garlic, gooseberries, grassland, ornamental nursery stock, lettuce, leeks, maize, oats, oilseed rape, onions, parsnips, peas, pears, plums, potatoes, radishes, rhubarb, wheat, strawberries, sugar beet, sweetcorn and triticale. It is also approved for use as a fabric and machinery treatment in grain stores and as a public hygiene insecticide.

The Advisory Committee on Pesticides recently considered two US Government studies—a review of chlorpyriphos-associated cases of delayed neuropathy and a review of chlorpyriphos poisoning data—and recommended that although no action need be taken on present UK approvals for chlorpyriphos as a result of these they should be drawn to the attention of the Commission and Spain which is currently reviewing chlorpyriphos as part of the EC review programme. This has been done.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Income Support

4. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment she has made of the reasons why pensioners do not claim income support. [19060]

Mr. Denham: The previous Administration took the view that the only explanation for non take up of benefit was choice by poor pensioners. This has meant that up to 1 million pensioners who are entitled to Income Support do not claim it. We are determined to get help to those pensioners. We have commissioned research to find out why they do not take up their benefit entitlement and from next April will run pilot exercises to establish how best to get help to them.

28. Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate she has made of the number of pensioners who are entitled to receive income support but do not claim it. [19085]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Around a million pensioners are not taking up their entitlement to Income Support, and we are determined to get help to them. We have commissioned research to find out why they do not make a claim, and from next April we will run a number of pilot exercises to find out how best to get help to them.

Pensions

10. Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement on the availability of value for money pensions to those on low incomes. [19066]

Mr. Denham: Occupational schemes provide good quality second pensions for half of all employees, but personal pensions can be unsuitable for those on low incomes. As part of our pensions review we are consulting widely on how best to take forward our proposals for Stakeholder Pensioners to ensure that those without good quality occupational pension schemes have access to secure, flexible, value for money second pensions.

The consultation period for Stakeholder Pensions ends in January and we expect to publish our detailed proposals, alongside our proposals for the long-term framework for pensions, in the first half of next year.

22. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps she is taking to publicise the level of rebates available for those opting out of the state earnings-related pensions scheme under recent pension tax changes. [19078]

Mr. Denham: The National Insurance Rebates available to those who contract-out of the State Earnings Related Pension Scheme are contained in three rebate Orders which were laid before this House in April last year. These Orders are available to the public from HMSO.

The Contributions Agency issues to employers and insurance companies publications which give details of the contracting-out rebates.

Means-tested Benefits

14. Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations she has received on the impact of the current rate of inflation on the recipients of means-tested benefits. [19070]

Mr. Field: None.

25. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment she has made of the impact on the social security budgets for means-tested benefits of the current rate of inflation. [19081]

Mr. Field: The uprating of benefits for 1998–99 was announced on 2 December and will ensure that the main rates of benefits are protected from inflation. The cost of protecting benefits from inflation for 1998–99 will be £2.45 billion.

Council Tax Benefits

23. Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement on the impact of the proposed reduction in council tax benefit. [19079]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The proposal to limit Council Tax Benefit for properties in bands F, G and H to the maximum available for band E properties is one of a number of measures we inherited from the previous Administration. We have had to make a number of hard choices in order to honour our commitment to keep spending within the planned ceiling for Social Security expenditure. We have decided, therefore, to proceed with the measure.

Sixty-five thousand people will be affected. But we are continuing to fully subsidise more than 98 per cent. of Council Tax Benefit recipients who do not live in the most expensive properties.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much money will be saved by the proposed restriction of council tax benefit for those living in properties of higher values in (a) England and Wales and (b) Scotland. [19065]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The estimated savings from the restriction of Council Tax Benefit for properties in council tax bands F, G and H to band E are £13½ million in England and Wales and £1½ million in Scotland for 1998–99.

Mortgage Interest Rates

24. Mr. Bradshaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations she has received on the application of standard interest rates on those with mortgages and claiming benefits. [19080]

Mr. Keith Bradley: We have received 755 representations from hon. Members, members of the public and national organisations.

Benefits System

26. Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to modernise the distribution mechanisms within the benefits system. [19082]

Mr. Field: Better service is central to our approach to Welfare Reform. Our vision for Active Modern Service is based around people. That means providing an integrated service that is focused on what customers need.

We have therefore asked the Benefits Agency to improve its distribution of publicity material about benefits to the public.

The Benefits Agency will simplify its programme of leaflets and other media, in order to provide better information and allow the customer easier access to the benefits system.

New leaflets will be designed with the customer as the main focus, not the system. The Benefits Agency will then put mechanisms in place to ensure consistent messages across all customer information.

These improvements will cover existing formats and all relevant aspects of electronic media.

The Benefits Agency has recently launched an expanded Website, providing information on benefits, new customer complaints procedure and local office details. The site receives over 12,000 visits a week.

State Pensions

27. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations she has received on the level of the basic state pension. [19083]

Mr. Denham: On 17 July, my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State announced a review of the central areas of insecurity for elderly people, including all aspects of the basic pension and its value. Many of the more than 2,000 responses to the initial consultation exercise included representations on the level of the basic state pension. We will examine all the responses in the weeks and months to come. We will then publish our initial framework for change in the first half of 1998.

We recently announced that from next April the basic pension will rise to £103.40 a week for a couple and £64.70 for a single pensioner. This is in keeping with our manifesto commitment to uprate the basic pension at least in line with prices. It is in line with the 3.6 per cent. increase in prices in September which was higher than expected, and the cost will be greater than was included in the previous Government's spending plans.

Women's Issues

29. Ann Keen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to open up a new dialogue with women. [19086]

Ms Ruddock: We are creating a new bond of trust between women and Government by opening up a new dialogue with women by improving and extending the way in which Government communicates with women's organisations and by looking at ways to conduct a dialogue with women who do not join organisations.

As part of this process, we are reviewing the role and status of the Women's National Commission. The terms of reference of this review is set out in the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Ms Moran) on 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 602.

30. Lorna Fitzsimons: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what contact she has had with women's organisations in Northern Ireland. [19087]

Ms Ruddock: The Ministers for Women represent the interests of all women, throughout the United Kingdom. On 2 December, I visited Northern Ireland to open the Northern Ireland Women's Coalition offices. I also visited the Northern Ireland Equal Opportunities Commission and met with women from the Northern Ireland Women's Forum, and other women's organisations. We have also had correspondence with the Northern Ireland Women's Aid Federation.

38. Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to use women's juries to consult on policy priority. [19095]

Ms Ruddock: We seek to create a new bond of trust between women and Government which will enable us to keep in touch with what women want by opening up a new dialogue with women.

We are doing this by improving and extending the way in which Government communicates with women's organisations; and by looking at ways to conduct a dialogue with women who do not join organisations.

We are considering a range of options—including setting up women's juries—to ensure that our new dialogue will be a new, innovative and effective way of communicating with women everywhere.

Ms Keeble: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how she plans to ensure that Government Departments take full account of women's interests. [19069]

Ms Ruddock: We are taking steps to ensure that women's interests are placed at the very heart of government. This means integrating women's concerns and interests into the policy-making process of all Government Departments—a process often called "mainstreaming".

However, we believe that the guidance on "mainstreaming" drawn up by the previous Government should be strengthened. We are therefore working on revised guidance, which will be more accessible and user-friendly.

Once this guidance has been issued, we will be evaluating its effect on a regular basis to ensure that it is properly used. We aim to publish an annual report which will cover how each Department has taken this work forward.

Housing Benefit

31. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what policy proposals she has for reducing housing benefit payments in the case of inflated rent levels. [19088]

Mr. Keith Bradley: There are already measures in place which restrict the amount of rent which can be used to calculate housing benefit entitlement. Generally, housing benefit will only meet average rents for tenants living in the private rented sector. However, we are looking at the interaction of housing and housing benefit as part of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants in the benefits area relating to the Hendon constituency are in receipt of housing benefit; how many of these are in (a) private houses, (b) local authority housing and (c) housing association housing; and if he will indicate in respect of each category (i) the highest amount paid, (ii) the average figure, (iii) the median figure and (iv) the upper and lower quartile figures. [20817]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The information is not available in the format requested as housing benefit information is not collected on a constituency basis. Such information as is available relates to the London Borough of Barnet and is set out in the table.

Caseloads and weekly average amounts of housing benefit for the London Borough of Barnet at the end of May 1997

Disability Benefits

32. Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of people of working age currently receiving disability benefits she plans to assist to move from welfare to work. [19089]

Mr. Denham: The Government believe that work is the best form of welfare for people of working age. Up to £195 million, set aside from the Windfall Tax, will be used to finance a range of options aimed at helping people on disability benefits, in the most effective way possible, to move into or stay in work. As a first stage we are this week initiating the bidding process under which we will fund a number of innovative schemes. We also plan to introduce personal advisers to help people with a disability or long-term illness to overcome barriers to work, initially on a modest scale. These initiatives will inform decisions about how best to offer help to all those who need it.

36. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on welfare reform for disability benefits. [19093]

37. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement on the provision of state benefits for disabled people. [19094]

Mr. Denham: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) on 8 December 1997, Official Report, columns 451–52.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to investigate the extent of and reasons for the underclaiming of disability benefits amongst disabled people (a) in general and (b) by each main type of disability. [20705]

Mr. Denham: The information is not yet available. We are using the disability follow-up to the 1996–97 Family Resources Survey to measure the take up of disability benefits. The analysis will include investigation of the characteristics of recipients and entitled non-recipients as far as sample sizes allow. Results will be published towards the end of 1998.

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is her policy on disability benefits. [19084]

Mr. Denham: We are committed to modernising the Social Security system so that it helps people to work as far as they are able; provides appropriate support to those who cannot work; and makes the most effective use of the resources available.

Child Care

33. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations she has received from women's groups on the child care provisions announced in the pre-Budget statement. [19090]

Ms Ruddock: In his pre-Budget statement, my right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced a £300 million package of investment in child care provision over the next five years. This announcement was widely welcomed by women's groups and voluntary organisations.

Key players in child care provision—including women's groups—will be invited to a conference on the National Child care Strategy, hosted jointly by the Secretaries of State for Social Security and for Education and Employment, in January.

Pensions Rights (Divorced People)

34. Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals she has to enable men and women to share pension rights on divorce. [19091]

Mr. Denham: Pension sharing recognises the contribution that both women and men make to a marriage. The Government are committed to introducing pension sharing for divorcing couples and we aim to do so from April 2000. We are working through the detailed issues and implementation arrangements with a panel of representatives of the pensions industry, family lawyers and others, and plan to publish a draft Bill for consultation. This is an important first step in our programme of modernising the pension system to improve the income of women in retirement.

Lone Parents

35. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations she has received on her proposals in respect of lone parent benefits. [19092]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Representations about the proposed changes to lone parent benefits were made by a wide variety of organisations to the Social Security Advisory Committee. These representations were reflected in the Social Security Advisory Committee's report, which was published on 30 July together with the Government's response as Command Paper 3713. Similar points have been raised in correspondence from hon. Members and members of the public. There were parliamentary debates on the family premium regulations on 4 November and 12 November and the change to Child Benefit was debated during the Committee Stages of the Social Security Bill on 18 November and at Report and Third Reading on 10 December. A record of these debates has been published in the Official Report.

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement on her proposals to help lone parents. [19073]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The Government's New Deal for Lone Parents is already operating in eight areas of the country, providing a personalised back-to-work service for lone parents.

My right hon. Friend The Chancellor announced on 26 November that from next April the New Deal for Lone Parents will be made available to all lone parents who make a new claim for Income Support. The New Deal will be available to all lone parents from October next year, at a cost of £175 million over the course of this Parliament. This included an additional £25 million, also announced by the Chancellor, to enable the service to be offered to those lone parents with a child under five who want to work.

In addition, we announced a £300 million initiative to extend out-of-school child care provision to every community.

Family Credit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement on the relationship between family credit and the proposed working family tax credit. [19075]

Mr. Field: The Government are proposing a new working families' tax credit with cash paid directly through the wage packet to families on low income. The tax credit will build on the success of family credit and will help ensure that work pays for families with children.

The precise form of the working family tax credit has yet to be decided.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants in receipt of family credit have total earnings below the lower earnings limit for national insurance contributions; and how many of these are (a) women and (b) lone parents. [20806]

Mr. Keith Bradley: At 31 May 1997 there were 175,000 recipients of Family Credit with earnings below the lower earnings limit. Of these 112,000 were female (main earners), and 88,000 were lone parents.

Notes:

1. Information on the gender of Family Credit claimants is not available, the figure quoted is based on the gender of the main earner.

2. Sample size 5 per cent. of all awards.

3. Figures have been rounded to the nearest thousand.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will estimate the percentage of claimants of (a) SSP and (b) the lower rate of short-term incapacity benefit who go on to receive (i) the higher rate of short-term incapacity benefit and (ii) long-term incapacity benefit. [20811]

Mr. Denham: Information is not available on the proportion of total SSP recipients who subsequently move onto the short-term higher rate of incapacity benefit and then long-term incapacity benefit. Around 35 per cent. of short-term lower rate cases move onto the short-term higher rate and around 15 per cent. subsequently move onto the long-term rate[1].

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if the seminars recently organised at Baroness Hollis's request covering the possibility of taxing or means-testing disability benefits or substituting services are part of her Department's formal consultation on changes to benefit entitlement for disabled people; [17034]

(2) if she will publish a Green Paper setting out the Government's proposals and options for reform of disability benefits before making any significant changes to them. [17036]

Mr. Denham: I understand that my noble Friend, Baroness Hollis of Heigham, has recently attended seminars, covering a wide range of disability issues at the invitation of, and arranged by MENCAP, on behalf of various groups representing disabled people and their carers. These seminars were proposed by disability organisations so that they could present their views on disability benefits. My noble Friend found them helpful and informative.

We are currently undertaking a comprehensive review of the Department's expenditure as a first stage in our plan to modernise the Social Security system. The review is wide-ranging and includes the complex range of benefits paid to people who have health problems or who are disabled. No decisions on any options for change have been reached and no changes will be made before we have consulted people with disabilities and their organisations. We have regularly met organisations representing people with disabilities or health problems. These meetings have helped inform debate on what they see as the problems inherent in the current system, on how resources could be used more effectively, and on the development of our proposals for Welfare to Work for sick and disabled people. We continue to welcome the views of sick and disabled people, their representative organisations and others with an interest.

Low Pay

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to her answer of 2 December, Official Report, column 204, how many full-time employees are paid at the lowest hourly rates listed, in each of the regions defined by the regional government offices. [20654]

Mr. Field: The information is not readily available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

Economic planning region	Number of full-time employees on the lowest hourly rate
Scotland	132
Northern	24
Yorkshire and Humberside	45
North West	252
East Midlands	36

Widows' Benefit

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what percentage of applications for widows' benefits are refused on the grounds of an insufficient contribution record. [20810]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available. However, it is estimated that 40,000 widows aged under 60 do not receive any Widows' Benefits, 15 per cent. of the total.

Reduced Earnings Allowance

Mr. Denis Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are in receipt of reduced earnings allowance in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the benefit office area serving the Wansbeck constituency and (c) average benefit office areas of equivalent size. [19246]

Mr. Denham: The administration of Reduced Earnings Allowance is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Denis Murphy, dated 12 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people are in receipt of Reduced Earnings Allowance (REA) in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the benefit office area serving the Wansbeck constituency and (c) average benefit office areas of equivalent size.

The information is not available in the format requested. REA statistics are available for the Benefits Agency Northumbria District, which includes the offices at Ashington, Berwick, Blyth, Hexham, North Shields and Wallsend, and for Great Britain.

As at 31 March 1996, the number of customers in receipt of REA in the Northumbria District is estimated at 1,078. In Great Britain it is estimated at 150,590. The figures are based on a ten per cent sample of all REA assessments.

Figures on average benefit office areas of equivalent size to the Wansbeck constituency are not available.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Benefit Statistics

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what proportion of claimants of (a) unemployment benefit, (b) sickness benefit and (c) maternity allowance received the standard rate, three quarter rate and the half rate of benefit, broken down by gender, in the last full year for which statistics are available. [20807]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 16 December 1997

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Royal Opera House

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he expects Sir Richard Eyre's review of the funding of the Royal Opera House to be completed; and if he will make a statement. [20930]

Mr. Chris Smith: I have asked Sir Richard Eyre and his group to report to me by 1 May 1998.

Excellence in Sport

Mrs. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has for fostering excellence in sport; and if he will make a statement. [21586]

Mr. Chris Smith: I have today announced that Sheffield will be the headquarters of the New United Kingdom Sport Institute (UKSI).

The joint decision taken by Ministers and the United Kingdom Sports Council (UKSC) is an historic moment for sport. I believe it will provide our very best sporting talent with the facilities and backup to help them challenge and beat the rest of the world. Sheffield will be the heart of a network—setting the standards and giving leadership to the nationwide network of facilities.

We have decided to locate the headquarters site at Sheffield because the bid: offered an extremely cohesive site with good transport and infrastructure; had responded particularly well to the vision and strategy set out by the Government and UKSC on the framework for the network; and builds on the existing public investment in sports facilities in Sheffield.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proposals he has to allow hon. Members to challenge a refusal by a Minister to provide the information requested by means of a written parliamentary question. [21168]

Dr. David Clark: Ministers are committed to answering parliamentary questions in accordance with the Resolution of the House of 19 March 1997. If a Member believes that he or she has not received a satisfactory answer to a question, it is open to him or her to challenge the relevant Minister on those grounds.

Freedom of Information

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if the powers of Ministers to refuse to provide information requested in response to written parliamentary questions will be curtailed by the proposals included in the White Paper on Freedom of Information. [21167]

Dr. David Clark: Ministers are required by the House to answer parliamentary questions in accordance with the Resolution of 19 March 1997. This states:

> "Ministers should be as open as possible with Parliament, refusing to provide information only when disclosure would not be in the public interest, which should be decided in accordance with relevant statute and the Government's Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Second Edition, January 1997)".

At such time as a Freedom of Information Act comes into force, the House will no doubt wish to consider amending the reference in that Resolution to the Code of Practice accordingly.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if information relating to the Sovereign and her family in respect of their public roles will be available to the public under the proposals set out in the White Paper on Freedom of Information; and if he will make a statement. [21194]

Dr. David Clark: Such information, where it is held by Government Departments, would be within the scope of the proposed Freedom of Information Act. Whether the information can be disclosed in particular cases will depend on whether it passes the harm and public interest tests integral to the Act's access provisions.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how long the consultation period in respect of the White Paper on Freedom of Information will last; and what target date he has for the introduction of a Bill to give effect to its provisions. [21142]

Dr. David Clark: Comments and views on the proposals in the White Paper "Your Right to Know" (Cm 3818) are invited by 28 February 1998. Later in the year we will publish a draft Bill, also for consultation. In the light of comments received about this, a Bill will be introduced to the House as soon as the legislative programme permits.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will carry out an assessment to establish whether the test of substantial harm in the White Paper on Freedom of Information could obviate the need for the blanket exemption proposed for the security services. [21169]

Dr. David Clark: This issue was considered in developing the proposals set out in the White Paper. The reasons why an exclusion from the Act was considered necessary for the Security and Intelligence Services are explained in paragraph 2.3.

Appointments

Kali Mountford: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many non-departmental public bodies were in existence on 1 April; what percentage of appointments to these bodies were (a) women and (b) members of ethnic minorities; and when the annual list of such bodies will be published. [21504]

Dr. David Clark: These figures are set out in the Cabinet Office (OPS) booklet "Public Bodies 1997", which is published today. Copies have been placed in the Library. On 1 April 1997 there were 1,128 non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) in existence. As of 1 September 1997, 32 per cent. of the appointments to bodies listed in "Public Bodies" were held by women, an increase of 1 per cent. over the previous year; and 3.6 per cent. were held by members of the ethnic minorities, an increase of 0.3 per cent. over the previous year.

This Government are determined to keep the number of NDPBs to a minimum and Ministers are taking a personal look at the need for each NDPB they sponsor. The Government are also taking action to increase the number of women and members of ethnic minorities represented on the boards of such bodies.

CABINET OFFICE

Millennium Experience

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio what estimate he has made of the likely effect of the Millennium Experience in displacing visitors from other London attractions during 2000. [18618]

Mr. Mandelson: The British Tourist Authority predicts that the Millennium Experience will add considerable value to the tourism product offered by this country, estimating that visitors will on average extend their stay in Britain by more than a day in order to take in the Experience. Existing London attractions should regard the Millennium Experience not as a threat, therefore, but as an opportunity to attract more visitors themselves.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Intergovernmental Conference

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he and the Prime Minister were present throughout each session of the IGC at Amsterdam. [20474]

Mr. Doug Henderson: My right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister were present at each session of the IGC at Amsterdam. Inevitably one or other had to leave the room from time to time, but at no time were both absent.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the status of the Falkland Islands is being considered as part of the Dependent Territories Review. [21202]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The review of the Dependent Territories covers generic issues (such as nomenclature and constitutional status) relevant to all remaining DTs, including the Falkland Islands. Given the special factors which apply to the Falklands no individual review of their status is being carried out.

We are committed to upholding the right of the Falkland Islanders to remain British. We have no doubts about British sovereignty over the Falkland Islands and do not regard that sovereignty as negotiable.

Export Forum

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Cotter) of 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 596, on the DTI/FCO Export Forum, if he will make a statement on his plans to help United Kingdom companies export their goods abroad. [21293]

Mr. Fatchett: This Department will continue to give the highest importance to helping British business perform to its full potential in overseas markets. Our response to some Export Forum recommendations will need to await the completion of the DTI/FCO Comprehensive Spending Review.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

European Court of Justice Case C-409/95

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Attorney-General if he will place in the Library the written observations drafted on behalf of the UK Government and submitted to the European Court of Justice in case C-409/95 between Helmut Marschall and Land NordRhein-Westfalen. [20290]

The Attorney-General: It is not the practice of the Government to release copies of pleadings in cases before the European Court of Justice. Such pleadings are addressed to the Court and are prepared with the specific purpose of informing the Court and the other parties of the arguments of the party submitting the pleadings. The practice is in accordance with the exclusion in paragraph 4(e) of Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (information relating to legal proceedings).

WALES

Non-departmental Public Bodies

Mr. Touhig: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the impact of his proposed reforms of non-departmental public bodies and agencies on the economy in Wales. [19383]

Mr. Ron Davies: The Government of Wales Bill provides for the merger of the Welsh Development Agency, the Land Authority for Wales and the Development Board for Rural Wales. This will achieve the Government's objective of reducing the number of unaccountable public bodies in Wales, and will provide for more efficient and effective economic development services across the whole of Wales.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many whole-time equivalent publicly funded officials were employed by non-departmental public bodies in May; and what estimate he has made of the number to be so employed by 2000. [20125]

Mr. Ron Davies: As at May 1997, there were 2,169 full-time equivalent staff employed in executive NDPBs in Wales. Before the National Assembly for Wales is established in May 1999 the Government will take action to reduce the number of executive bodies in Wales from 19 to 14 and, thereafter, the assembly will be able to reduce further their number. This is likely to result in a reduction in the number of staff employed, but it is not possible at this time to estimate precisely what the actual numbers will be in 2000, as that depends on decisions yet to be taken.

Civil Servants

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many whole-time equivalent civil servants were employed in his Department in May 1997; and what estimate he has made of the number who will be so employed in 2000. [20102]

Mr. Ron Davies: My Department employed some 2,300 whole-time equivalent civil servants in May 1997. Staffing levels for the year 2000 will be determined by the National Assembly for Wales.

Welsh Assembly

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list the members of the Conservative Party whom he consulted prior to selecting a Conservative representative to sit on the Assembly advisory board; [20132]

(2) if he will list the representatives of the (a) Liberal Democrats and (b) Plaid Cymru whom he consulted prior to making appointments to the Assembly advisory board. [20139]

Mr. Ron Davies: I consulted a wide range of interests before deciding on the membership of the Welsh Assembly Advisory Group. These consultations were confidential, and will remain so.

Private Office

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the operational costs of running his private office in (a) 1995–96 and (b) 1996–97; and what estimate he has made of the costs in (i) 1997–98 (ii) 1998–99 and (iii) 1999–2000. [20098]

Mr. Ron Davies: Costs vary with levels of Ministerial activity and time spent between London and Cardiff. The cost of Ministerial private offices in the Welsh Office was £724,230 in 1995–96 and £720,625 in 1996–97.

Some £483,000 has been expended in 1997–98 to the end of November. The cost for the remainder of the year will reflect the nature and scale of Ministerial commitments.

Budgets for 1998–99 have yet to be determined. For 1999–2000 budgets will take account of the role of the Secretary of State following the establishment of the National Assembly for Wales.

Second Homes

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will announce the outcome of the consultation on second home council tax discounts in Wales. [21502]

Mr. Win Griffiths: My right hon. Friend proposes to make regulations to widen the scope of Welsh local authorities' discretion to charge up to the full council tax on second homes. The regulations will have effect in relation to council taxes for 1 April 1988 onwards.

For a dwelling to fall within one of the new prescribed classes it will not be necessary for it to have previously been a sole or main residence. Nor will it be necessary for the dwelling to have been unused as a sole or main residence for the immediately preceding six months.

We propose to prescribe two classes in the regulations. One class will relate to dwellings with a restriction on occupancy by law which prohibits their use for a period of at least 28 days in any 12-month period. The other class will relate to dwellings which have no such restriction on occupancy.

These changes will allow local authorities the discretion to charge owners of dwellings in both classes up to the full council tax, or to decide on different treatment for homes which have the occupancy restriction and those which have no such restriction.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum and Immigration

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will estimate the time it will take his Department to complete work on applications made in December 1997 for (a) one year's leave to remain on the grounds of marriage, (b) settlement after having one year's stay on the grounds of marriage, (c) leave to remain as a student, (d) permission to stay under the provisions of the EU law and (e) asylum; [19026]

(2) what was the average time his Department took to deal with applications for (a) one year's leave to remain on the grounds of marriage, (b) settlement after having one year's stay on the grounds of marriage, (c) leave to remain as a student, (d) permission to stay under EU law and (e) asylum made in (i) November 1995, (ii) April 1996, (iii) November 1996 and (iv) April 1997. [19025]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: For applications on the basis of marriage, as a student or for asylum which have been decided, the available information is given in table 1. Data are not available in the same form for residence permits or residence documents issued. The percentages of applications decided within 1 month, 2 months or 6 months of receipt are given in table 2.

Data are also given for the latest available date. We expect to deal with most new marriage, student, and asylum applications made in December 1997 in shorter time scales than those shown for September or October 1997.

Table 1: Average time between application and decision, in months

Application type	Month of decision
	November 1995	April 1996	November 1996	April 1997	October 1997
One year's leave to remain after marriage	5.9	7.2	6.7	8.0	7.3
Settlement one year after marriage	2.5	2.2	2.2	2.6	3.1

Post 1993 Act cases	9.7	11.1	12.6	13.7	13.8

Table 2: Percentage of residence permits and residence documents issued

Per cent.

	Month of decision
	November 1995	April 1996	November 1996	April 1997	September 1997[1]

[1] The reduction in the percentage of permits and documents issued within these timescales compared with earlier returns reflects the fact that resources have been targeted at deciding older applications.

Police (Riot Training)

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if the plastic baton round training referred to in the Minister of State's letter of 18 August to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley was provided (a) by the Royal Ulster Constabulary or (b) for the Royal Ulster Constabulary; [20029]

(2) what discussions he has had with the Association of Chief Police Officers are permitted to use firearms against unarmed demonstrators; [20048]

(3) if Surrey Police Force has taken the actions referred to in his letter to the hon. Member for Cynon Valley of 18 August concerning the Otec Ultima system; [20045]

(4) which United Kingdom police forces use the Otec Ultima training programme; [20042]

(5) if he will make it his policy to ensure that United Kingdom police forces using the Otec Ultima trainer observe the principle of minimum force; [20043]

(6) which foreign military, security or police forces have been supplied with the Otec Ultima Multi Media Weapons trainer; and if the training package included the video sequence displaying police using firearms on unarmed demonstrators; [20044]

(7) if police baton gunners trained on the Otec Ultima system have been retrained in accordance with his Department's guidelines on the discharge of plastic baton rounds on unarmed demonstrators. [20046]

Mr. Michael: I do not know which foreign military, security or police forces have been supplied with the Otec Ultima Multi Media Weapons training system but I understand that a marketing video for the system, which included a scene of a police officer firing a gun at rioters in a training simulation, was sent abroad by a British company. The scene was entirely inappropriate and, as I explained to my hon. Friend on 18 August, it has been dropped from the current marketing video. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing the scene to my attention. The training system is used by the City of London, Metropolitan and Surrey police forces. None of these forces uses the system for baton round training. The training referred to in my letter of 18 August concerned an invitation to tender for the provision of a simulator to help in the training by the Royal Ulster Constabulary of its baton round gunners. That letter did not call upon Surrey police to take any action.

The Home Office has not discussed with the Association of Chief Police Officers circumstances in which officers would be permitted to use firearms against unarmed demonstrators because, as I said in my answer on 12 June 1997, Official Report, column 512, it would be entirely wrong for police forces to train officers to fire on unarmed demonstrators. All officers trained in the use of plastic baton round launchers have been trained in accordance with Home Office guidelines on the use of baton rounds for dealing with public disorder. Any officer using force must comply with section 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 which provides that a person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances in preventing crime or arresting an offender. I would expect chief officers to ensure that this is fully reflected in any training of officers.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with the Association of Chief Police Officers concerning his Department's guidelines on the discharge of plastic baton rounds against unarmed demonstrators. [20047]

Mr. Michael: The Association of Chief Police Officers was consulted about Home Office guidelines on the use of baton rounds for dealing with public disorder when they were first issued in 1981 and during subsequent revisions, the most recent of which was in 1995. A copy of the guidelines is in the Library. I am aware that the Association of Chief Police Officers have been considering whether, in their view, any amendments to the guidelines should be made; but no proposals have been put forward and no recent discussions on this subject have taken place with the Home Office.

Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what checks are made, and by whom, on the quality and the variation of food served to people being held in the Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre. [20619]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Harmondsworth Detention Centre is managed under contract to the Home Office by Group 4 Total Security Ltd., and meals are prepared for detainees by contract caterers.

The Area catering advisor of the Prison Service Catering Services is contracted to visit the centre regularly in order to survey the consumer dietary preferences, to review the menu cycle, and to examine the food budget balance. The contract caterers respond to comments from the adviser and monitor the "take up" rate of the menus offered, so as to be able to amend the meals and menus appropriately.

The centre is also regularly inspected for food hygiene by the Environmental Health Officer of the London Borough of Hillingdon in accordance with the Food Safety Act 1990.

Group 4's local managers check daily that meals prepared are within the "use by" date, and also sample the meals on a random basis and in response to any complaints. Meals are also regularly sampled by members of the Harmondsworth Visiting Committee, an independent body appointed by the Home Secretary to monitor the care and treatment of detainees. Immigration Service staff also occasionally sample meals.

Youth Justice

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ensure that the responses to the consultation papers on Youth Justice and Community Safety Orders are published before the Crime and Disorder Bill receives its Second Reading. [20372]

Mr. Michael: Summaries of the responses to the consultation papers "Tackling Youth Crime". "New National and Local Focus on Youth Crime" and "Tackling Delays in the Youth Justice System" were placed in the Library on 15 December 1997. A summary of the responses to the consultation paper "Community Safety Order" has been placed in the Library today.

Departmental Wages

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many full-time employees are paid at the rate of £3.84 an hour in his Department. [20605]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 15 December 1997]: Forty-seven, out of a total of 48,192 full-time employees.

General Elections

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what statistics his Department collates on expenditure of candidates in general elections. [21503]

Mr. Straw: The total expenses of candidates in general elections between 1857 and 1992 are set out in the tables below. Table 1 shows the actual expenditure. Table 2 has the figures indexed to 1992 prices.

The figures for the 1997 general election are not yet available.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for the payment of grant under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 to provide additional support for ethnic minorities. [21487]

Mr. Straw: We fully recognise the value of work which section 11 grant has supported and the importance that local authorities and communities attach to this. We have commissioned a study to consider how such support needed for members of ethnic minorities can best be provided. The exercise is being conducted by my Department in collaboration with the Department for Education and Employment. I very much hope that local authorities and other interested parties will contribute views. The findings of the study, which are expected to be available in the spring, will inform our further consideration.

Immigration Detainees (Minors)

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) where the legal responsibility for unaccompanied minors detained in immigration detention centres rests; [20655]

(2) whether the protection and care of unaccompanied minors in Campsfield House Immigration Detention Centre is the responsibility of the Oxfordshire Child Protection Committee. [20657]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It is our policy not to detain unaccompanied minors save only in very exceptional circumstances. Normal procedure is to grant temporary admission wherever possible, either into the care of a close relative or friend, or into the care of social services. In the few instances where detention is considered essential, accommodation appropriate to the age of the detainee is provided and a member of staff is appointed to act as a chaperon as necessary.

Legal responsibility for unaccompanied minors detained in immigration detention centres rests with the Home Office. Any assistance offered by the Oxfordshire Child Protection Committee would always be given consideration.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the arrangements to secure the accountability of, and to monitor the actions of, private security personnel working in immigration detention centres, with particular reference to the custody and care of unaccompanied minors. [20659]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The performance of private sector security companies employed under contract to manage and operate immigration detention centres is monitored by on-site Immigration Service staff and, where appropriate, by specialist Home Office personnel. In addition, Immigration Service staff based at Immigration Service Headquarters are involved in the quality assurance process and hold regular review meetings with senior management from Group 4 Total Security Ltd., and Wackenhut United Kingdom Ltd., in order to ensure that the highest standards are maintained and that all contractual obligations are met.

It is not normal policy or practice to detain unaccompanied minors and these are held only in the most exceptional of circumstances. All private sector companies involved in immigration detention are aware of the special significance of their duty of care in the case of unaccompanied minors.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what separate accommodation is provided for unaccompanied minors detained in immigration detention centres. [20656]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Our normal policy is not to detain unaccompanied minors, and no accommodation is specifically set aside for their use in immigration detention centres. When it is necessary to detain an unaccompanied minor, a single room is provided in a discrete part of the detention centre used for those in need of close care or support.

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many unaccompanied minors have been detained in Campsfield House, Oxfordshire, in each month of 1997 (a) under Immigration Act powers and (b) under other legislation. [20658]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Many of those who are liable to detention under powers conferred by the Immigration Act 1971, and who may at some stage have sought asylum in the United Kingdom, are not in possession of documents satisfactorily establishing either their identity or nationality. Some hold identity documents but claim to be younger than the ages shown therein. It is perhaps inevitable in these circumstances that there will be some cases where the precise age of the individual is in dispute.

During 1997, 12 persons claimed to be under 18 years of age while detained at Campsfield House. Information on when those persons first entered detention, under Immigration Act powers, at Campsfield House is given in the table. None of those persons were detained at Campsfield House as at 10 December 1997.

Age assessment remains an inexact science and definitive assessments cannot be made. The Immigration Service liaises closely with the Refugee Council's Panel of Advisers for Refugee Children. All cases where there is a dispute as to the age of an applicant are referred to the Panel.

While there is no minimum age below which a person may not be detained under powers conferred by the Immigration Act, under current guidelines detention is not usually considered appropriate for unaccompanied children or for persons under the age of 18. It is normal practice to grant temporary admission to those who are clearly unaccompanied minors, usually into the care of social services.

Prisoners (Telephone Calls)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on prison policy and rules relating to the (a) issue of and (b) payment for telephone cards and access to and use of prison telephones for contact with close relatives outside the jurisdiction; and how many minutes and how many calls are permitted each week for prisoners who are (i) on remand and (ii) on trial. [20337]

Ms Quin: In accordance with the rules and policy set out in Prison Service Standing Order 5 and Circular Instructions 61/1989 and 21/1992 (copies of which are in the Library) governing prisoner access and use of cardphones, prisoners may purchase from the prison shop phonecards using their earnings or private cash. Foreign nationals with close family ties abroad are exempted from the limits on access to private cash which apply under the Incentives and Earned Privileges scheme.

Current policy on conditions of use allow all prisoners to have free access to a cardphone during association hours and at such other times as is reasonably practicable. Cardphones should normally be available for use of a period of not less than two hours a day. However, governors have discretion to impose time limits or a booking system for each prisoner if this is necessary to ensure equitable access to cardphones in their establishment.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many family telephone calls and of what duration Brian McHugh was permitted to make in (a) September, (b) October and (c) November 1997. [20332]

Ms Quin: Mr. McHugh made 34 calls in September 1997; 28 calls in October 1997; and 30 calls in November 1997. All the calls made were to members of Mr. McHugh's family. The length of Mr. McHugh's calls varied from three to 20 minutes.

The standard procedures concerning the use of telephones by high risk prisoners at Belmarsh Prison do not set an upper limit on the duration of any telephone call. Prisoners cannot, however, make calls when their phonecards have expired or when the call would prevent another prisoner's pre-booked telephone call taking place.

Roisin McAliskey

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what submissions he has received from (a) the legal representatives of Roisin McAliskey and (b) others concerning her proposed extradition; and if he will make a statement. [20284]

Mr. Straw: Roisin McAliskey's solicitors submitted formal representations on 28 November 1997 asking me, exceptionally, either to reconsider the authority to proceed issued on 2 January 1997 or to take a final decision on surrender under section 12 of the Extradition Act 1989 before a decision is reached in the committal proceedings.

The Divisional Court ruled in 1994 that the Secretary of State does not have the power to reconsider an order to proceed (which would extend to an authority to proceed), once issued. Nor does section 12 of the Extradition Act 1989 allow me to take a decision, either to order return or, on the basis of my discretion contained in that section, to decide not to order return, until a decision on committal is taken by the magistrate.

I have agreed, without prejudice to a final decision by the courts on committal or my own on surrender, to start considering the representations put before me.

In respect of submissions from others, since Roisin McAliskey was arrested for the purposes of extradition on 26 November 1996, 7 Parliamentary Questions have been tabled: 16 letters from right hon. and hon. Members and 162 letters from members of the public have been received. One letter was handed in to the Home Office during a demonstration on 20 November and approximately 85 messages have been received via the Internet.

Prisoner Transfers

Mr. NcNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the principal purposes of the draft Additional Protocol to the Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons approved by the European Committee on Crime Problems in June 1997 and indicate the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the draft. [20286]

Mr. Michael: The Additional Protocol was adopted by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe in September and will be opened for signature on 18 December 1997.

The Protocol has two purposes. First, where a national from one state who is serving a custodial sentence in another state escapes from custody and returns to his home state, the Protocol allows the sentencing state, with the consent of the home state, to transfer the remainder of the sentence to the home state to continue enforcement. The consent of the fugitive offender is not required to such a transfer. This provision will be of particular value where the home state, for legal or constitutional reasons, does not extradite its own nationals and where at present no action can be taken against the fugitive offender.

The Protocol also enables a serving prisoner who is the subject of a deportation or expulsion order which will result in his eventual removal to be transferred, without his consent but subject to certain safeguards, to the state named in the order to serve the remainder of his sentence. At present, such orders are normally activated only at the end of the sentence. Early activation of the order would enable the state of destination to attach appropriate post-release conditions in more serious cases.

The Government support the Protocol and are considering what primary legislation would be needed before it could be ratified by the United Kingdom.

Belmarsh Prison

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the differences in prison regime for prisoners in each class of risk assessment within the Category A band separately indicating the conditions for those prisoners presently held in HMP Belmarsh who continue to occupy cells previously designated as a special secure unit. [20334]

Ms Quin: Category A prisoners are assigned to one of three escape risk classifications: standard risk, high risk and exceptional risk.

It is not possible to give a definitive account of prisoner regime by escape category. This will vary with the facilities available within each prison and in particular tends to be significantly different between remand prisons, such as Belmarsh, and dispersal prisons, such as Whitemoor, which hold convicted Category A prisoners.

Within dispersal prisons, additional restrictions will apply to exceptional risk prisoners who are held apart from other prisoners within a Special Secure Unit and who are subject to closed visits. In general terms, high risk prisoners within dispersal prisons have a similar regime to standard risk prisoners with a few additional constraints such as searching, the conduct of visits, allocation to activities, and vetting of letters and telephone calls.

Because of the additional complexities of a large remand prison such as Belmarsh, and in particular the greatly increased levels of prisoner movement with the associated increased risks of escape, high risk prisoners at Belmarsh are held apart from the rest of the prison population within the High Secure Unit (HSU). The regime within the HSU is similar to that within the rest of the prison with the exception that prisoners do not have access to other parts of the prison and all activities such as visits, exercise and gymnasium are conducted within purpose-built facilities in the HSU building itself.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department in what circumstances family visits for remand prisoners previously held in the Special Secure Unit at HMP Belmarsh and currently on trial is permitted in respect of the use of (a) the visitors' children's room and (b) children's books, crayons or toys. [20335]

Ms Quin: There is no specific children's room for visitors to those prisoners previously held in the Belmarsh Special Secure Unit. A box of toys and games is available for the use of visiting children.

Remand Prisoners (Injuries)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what record is maintained of the number of occasions on which remand prisoners are unable to appear in court as a result of injuries sustained en route; if he routinely receives reports of such injuries; and to whom trial judges report concerns in such cases. [20333]

Ms Quin: Between April 1993 and July 1997, the responsibility for transporting to court all prisoners other than those in the highest security category has progressively been contracted out to the private sector.

The Prisoner Escort and Custody Services of the Prison Service monitor all such contracts and require the submission of reports on all injuries sustained by prisoners while in the contractor's custody. These include details of the injuries sustained, the circumstances in which they were received, for example a road traffic accident, self harm, etc., and the action taken. Any such incident which may call into question the actions of the contractors or their staff is fully investigated by the prisoner escort monitor.

Incidents involving injuries to prisoners in the custody of escort contractors while on their way to court are extremely rare. Only two cases have been recorded where they were serious enough to prevent attendance.

Incidents relating to category A prisoners are reported to Prison Service Headquarters as well as being subject to full reports. However, figures relating to injuries to remand prisoners while in transit to court are not compiled centrally.

Trial judges are able to express any concerns about the late delivery or non-delivery of prisoners to the escort contractor, the escort monitor, the establishment dispatching the prisoner or Prison Service Headquarters.

All cases relating to prisoners moved by private sector contractors are investigated by the escort monitor. If, as a result of this investigation, a prisoner custody officer (PCO) is found to have been at fault, the escort monitor has the power under the Criminal Justice Act 1991 to recommend the revocation of the PCO's certificate.

Also, under the terms of the contract, the escort monitor may impose penalty points in cases where the contractor has failed to deliver the service specified. These penalties may lead to the imposition of financial remedies.

Where individual PCOs have not performed their duties satisfactorily they will be subject to the contractor's own disciplinary procedures.

Special Secure Units

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects Sir Donald Acheson to complete his review of the effect on prisoners' health when detained in a special secure unit; and if he will make a statement. [20283]

Ms Quin: There is currently only one special secure unit in operation at Whitemoor prison. Sir Donald Acheson visited the unit last month and I expect him to submit his report to the Prison Service shortly.

Expulsions and Deportations

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons currently serving a prison sentence in England and Wales will be subject upon completion of their sentence to an expulsion or deportation order to (a) Ireland, (b) states that are party to the European Convention on the Transfer of Sentenced Persons and (c) elsewhere. [20285]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Reliable information on those persons currently serving a prison sentence who may, on completion of their sentence, be subject to deportation action can be obtained only through examination of individual case records. Such information is, therefore, available only at disproportionate cost. Persons subject to deportation action are entitled to appeal against their stated removal destination and, hence, the issue of which country a person is to be removed to will not be resolved until their relevant appeal rights have been exhausted. In practice, reliable information on removal destination is not available centrally until removal has been effected. I regret that the information requested is not, therefore, available.

Human Rights

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the answer of the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs of 18 November 1997, Official Report, column 103, if the Prison Service was notified of the Government's support for the broad intentions of the UN texts; and if he will make a statement on their implementation. [20338]

Ms Quin: The Prison Service was notified of them, is committed to adhering as fully as possible to those recommendations that affect it, and has responded to occasional queries about them from the relevant United Nations bodies.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Council if she will publish the names of all those people she has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed and whether they receive remuneration. [19982]

Mrs. Ann Taylor: The UK Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator—Keith Hellawell—takes up his position formally on 5 January. I expect him to submit his proposals for a new strategy a few months after that, following an extensive consultation process.

The Government hope to publish their strategy document in the Spring.

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware, I have not received any representations on this subject.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 12 December 1997]: I refer to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Colman), 8 December 1997 Official Report, column 409. The Unit will draw up key indicators of social exclusion and recommend how they can be tracked.

British-Ugandan Asian Service

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister who represented the Government at the British-Ugandan Asian Service at Westminster Abbey. [21178]

The Prime Minister: The Government were not represented at the British Ugandan Asian Service at Westminster Abbey. But I welcome this opportunity to place on record my appreciation of the contribution made to British society by the Ugandan Asians since their arrival here 25 years ago.

Agricultural Produce Procurement

Mr. Gale: To ask the Prime Minister what steps he is taking to continue the policy of the Prime Minister promoting increased domestic procurement of agricultural produce; and what plans he has to audit the levels of domestic procurement. [21164]

The Prime Minister: Sourcing of supplies is a matter for the food industry. The Government's policy remains to help our farmers and growers to match their world-class products with a similar level of excellence in marketing.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Care Industry

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to review the funding arrangements for the training of people aged under 25 years in the care industry; and if he will make a statement. [19290]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 5 December 1997]: The Department has no plans to review the funding arrangements for the training of people aged under 25 years in the care industry.

Further Education (New Deal)

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what provision there will be in the New Deal funds put up for bidding next year to colleges of further education for the consequent impact of those funds on current facilities and infrastructure; and if he will make a statement; [20087]

(2) what assessment he has made of the additional administrative responsibilities placed on current facilities and infrastructure in colleges of further education by the New Deal funds which are to be bid for next year; and if he will make a statement. [20114]

Dr. Howells: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 12 November 1997, FE colleges will have the opportunity to bid for well over £100 million of New Deal funds next year. I am confident of the sector's ability to rise to the challenge and contribute to the success of this programme.

Access and Foundation Courses

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many (i) access and (ii) foundation course students are currently enrolled on courses which (a) are and (b) are not an integral part of a course of higher education. [20088]

Dr. Howells: The available information on foundation courses is limited. A survey conducted by the Higher Education Quality Council indicated that there were approximately 8,000 students on foundation courses which were integral parts of higher education courses in England in 1995–96. Equivalent figures for foundation courses which are not parts of higher education courses are not available. For access courses, figures collected by the Further Education Funding Council show that there were 27,200 students on access to higher education courses in further education sector colleges and external institutions in England in November 1996. Access courses are classified as further education courses, although some are designed for entry to specific higher education courses.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students currently enrolled on access and foundation courses applied for the course before 23 July; and if he will make a statement. [20089]

Dr. Howells: The information requested is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what proportion of students went on to higher education (i) within one year and (ii) within three years of having completed a foundation or access course in the last year for which figures are available. [20090]

Dr. Howells: The information requested is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Oxford and Cambridge Universities

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received in respect of the Government's plans for Oxbridge funding. [20515]

Dr. Howells: We have received around 200 letters over the last five months about the issue of college fees at Oxford and Cambridge. There have also been debates in both Houses. We have also met representatives of both Universities and their Colleges and, as my hon. Friend knows, I met him and the Master of Gonville and Caius College Cambridge on 2 December.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he last met the Vice-Chancellor of (a) Oxford and (b) Cambridge University. [20514]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met the Vice-Chancellors of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge on Wednesday 10 December.

Foundation Schools

Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how the new foundation schools will be funded; and how the arrangements for funding these schools will differ from those made for community schools. [20360]

Mr. Byers: Under the new school framework, recurrent funding will be provided by LEAs for community, foundation, and voluntary schools under revised local management of schools (LMS) arrangements. The details of this new LMS regime are currently under consideration, but it is the Government's firm intention that there should be no unfair discrimination between different school categories.

LEAs will be responsible for all the costs of capital work at foundation schools, as they will be for community schools. The only significant difference is that, where they provide a new or additional site for a foundation school, they will convey their interest in the site—excluding the playing fields—to the school's trustees, foundation body or governing body.

School Performance

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what requirements are placed on local education authorities' officers to inform their elected members of the performance of all of the schools in the authority's area, on a regular basis with particular reference to those which (a) are underperforming and (b) require extra support. [20376]

Mr. Byers: Each local authority is free to determine arrangements where officers report to elected members. However, under the proposals in the School Standards and Framework Bill now before Parliament, each authority will have in place by April 1999 an Education Development Plan agreed by elected members and approved by the Secretary of State, which will set out the performance and targets of all schools within the authority's area, including those which are underperforming or need support.

Higher Education

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make it his policy that public spending on higher education should increase in line with the growth in gross domestic product. [21159]

Dr. Howells: The Government intend that, over the course of this Parliament, public spending on education should increase as a proportion of national income, as the cost of social and economic failure is reduced. Detailed plans for the longer term, including for higher education, will be announced next Summer as part of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

The Government have already shown their commitment to maintaining and improving quality in higher education, as well as expanding access, through the package of measures announced on 23 September which made available an extra £165 million for higher education for 1998–99.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to implement Recommendation 19 of the National Committee of Inquiry into Higher Education. [21158]

Dr. Howells: The Government agree with the National Committee of Inquiry that familiarising students with work is an important way of enhancing their employability. We are already taking action to ensure that more student work placements become available. Next year, our Higher Education and Employment Development Programme will be providing £1.8 million to support projects working to provide more student work placements. These projects will include the creation of a national network to identify, exchange and disseminate emerging good practice on student work placement issues.

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he intends to announce the appointment of the chairman of the review committee that will examine the framework for determining pay and conditions of service for those in higher education. [21162]

Dr. Howells: The setting up of an independent review committee, as recommended by the National Committee of Inquiry into Higher Education, is the responsibility of the Universities and Colleges Employers Association (UCEA) and the higher education unions. My right hon. Friend has offered to facilitate the appointment of a chairman, rather than to nominate the chairman as recommended by the Committee. An announcement on the appointment of a chairman will therefore be a matter for UCEA and the unions.

Mature Students

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assistance will be given to students over the age of 50 years beginning higher or further education courses in 1998 towards the cost of living and tuition fees. [21156]

Dr. Howells: Under the new arrangements for higher education student support, students aged over 50 will be eligible for means-related help with tuition fees on the same basis as other students. In particular, if they are on low incomes they will continue to receive free tuition.

The majority of students over 50 are part-time and are therefore ineligible for student loans. Under the current student loans scheme full-time students who are aged 50 or over when their course starts are also ineligible. We do not plan any changes in the eligibility requirements for loans—including the age restrictions—for 1998–99. However, we are reviewing the position for future years in the context of the White Paper on lifelong learning due to be published in the new year. Both full and part-time students in higher education will be eligible for Access Funds from 1998–99, regardless of their age.

Students in further education will not be covered by these new arrangements. In 1998–99 they will be able to apply for a discretionary award from their local education authority. These arrangements are being reviewed for subsequent years.

Veterinary and Architecture Students

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what additional assistance will be given to (a) veterinary and (b) architecture students, beginning degree courses in 1998 and later, towards the cost of tuition fees for the fourth and subsequent years of their courses. [21157]

Dr. Howells: We have no plans to make special arrangements for additional assistance to such students.

University Applications

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the numbers of students applying to universities for admission in 1998, broken down by parliamentary constituency. [20506]

Dr. Howells: The data requested are not available centrally. The Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS) collects the postcode of applicants, which would enable individual constituencies to be identified, but at present no such analysis has been carried out. It is up to UCAS to decide whether or not to undertake one and to make the results publicly available.

Pupil Testing

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the cost of the National Testing System for fourteen-year-olds, (i) in total and (ii) broken down into costs for (a) printing, (b) postage of the test papers, (c) payments to the external markers and (d) fees charged by the company which processes the results, in the last year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [21294]

Ms Estelle Morris: The estimated overall costs of implementing the 1997 tests for 14-year-olds in English, mathematics and science was some £13.4 million. This included: (a) printing costs of around £1.6 million; (b) distribution costs of around £0.6 million; and (c) external marking costs of around £9.4 million. Fees paid to the data collection agency for processing the national results are commercially sensitive, but national data collection costs, which include this fee and other associated costs, were around £0.4 million.

Disability Rights

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will appoint a person with a learning disability to the Disability Rights Task Force; and if he will make a statement on the rights of people with learning disabilities. [21043]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I refer the hon. Member to the answer provided to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) on 15 December 1997, Official Report, column 7.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Zimbabwe

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what plans she has to withdraw payment of aid to Zimbabwe. [21204]

Mr. Foulkes: We have made it clear to the Government of Zimbabwe that we cannot provide aid for their programme of land acquisition in its current form, although we are open to discussions on alternative approaches to land reform.

We will be discussing with the Government whether we are able to establish a partnership with them on the basis outlined in the White Paper on International Development as a foundation for future aid commitments.

Tenders

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how she ensures that overseas tenders for which her Department are preparing are conducted in such a way as to ensure (a) value for money and (b) that all tenders have an equal chance of winning the contract. [21007]

Mr. Foulkes: My Department has in place systems which require that all contracts which are to be funded by DFID are reviewed and agreed by specialist advisers within the Department. We look for value-for-money by ensuring that invitations to tender are clear, unambiguous, and attract the widest possible field of interested suppliers. We are careful to check specifications and instructions to tenderers to ensure that all suitably qualified tenderers have an equal opportunity.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the extent to which the system of allowing export duty payable on aid contracts in India gives all those tendering an equal opportunity. [21009]

Mr. Foulkes: The rules concerning the application of all taxes and duties are clearly defined in contracts which are funded by the Department for International Development. Although these may vary from one contract to another, depending upon the particular needs of the recipient of the aid, all are designed to ensure that everyone who tenders is given an equal opportunity.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what reports she has evaluated on the circumstances surrounding the current tender for the machinery to monitor and control the supply of electricity to the City of Hyderabad in India; and if she will make a statement. [21008]

Mr. Foulkes: I am grateful for the opportunity to be able to draw attention to this valuable work. Not only will the project enable the electricity utility to operate more efficiently and therefore at lower cost but, more important, it will greatly improve the efficiency of the use of fuel, thereby reducing emissions and contributing to the fight against global warming. My Department has been fully represented in the formulation and design of the project, the production of the contract documents, and the evaluation of the bids. East Midlands Electricity International are the British experts representing the Department for International Development in this work, which has also been monitored by experts in electrical engineering and procurement from my Department.

The response to the invitation to tender has been excellent, with five bids submitted. The evaluation process has been completely transparent and fully in accordance with the very clear rules set out in the Instructions to the Bidders.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ponsonby Rules

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the President of the Council if he will list the (a) Government and (b) parliamentary publications relating to the operation of the Ponsonby Rules in relation to the European Communities Act 1972. [19353]

Mrs. Ann Taylor [holding answer 11 December 1997]: The practice known as the Ponsonby Rule applies to all treaties signed by the United Kingdom which are subject to ratification, acceptance or approval and to any treaty to which the United Kingdom intends to accede. It provides for such treaties to be laid before Parliament for a period of 21 sitting days before the United Kingdom ratifies, accepts, approves or accedes to them. Since 1 January 1997 such treaties when laid before Parliament have been accompanied by an Explanatory Memorandum (copies of guidance for Departments entitled "Guidelines on Explanatory Memoranda for Treaties" were placed in the Libraries of both Houses). The practice has no particular relationship to any Act of Parliament, and there has been no recent Government or Parliamentary publication relating to it.

TREASURY

Taxation and Benefits

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many employees would face combined marginal withdrawal rates of tax and benefits of (a) 100 per cent. or above, (b) 90 per cent. or above, (c) 80 per cent. or above, (d) 70 per cent. or above, (e) 60 per cent. or above and (f) 50 per cent. or above if they were (i) to work an extra one hour per week and (ii) to earn an extra £10 per week before tax. [19009]

Mrs. Liddell: Estimates for the number of families estimated to be facing high marginal deduction rates, after (i) working an extra hour a week and (ii) earning an extra £10 per week are contained in the following table:

Numbers facing high Marginal Deduction Rates (thousands)	(i) Working an extra hour a week	(ii) Earning an extra £10 a week	Current estimates
80+	355	350	360
70+	630	625	645
50+	645	640	660

Note:
The estimates are rounded to the nearest 5,000; *denote a figure of less than 2,500. Current estimates, are based on the combination of taxes and benefits which each benefit unit receives.

Figures are calculated for benefit units in receipt of income-related benefits where at least one partner works 16 hours a week or more.

Ministerial Announcements

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many ministerial announcements have not been made in the first instance to the House; and of those how many were (a) speeches to outside bodies, (b) press releases, (c) press briefings and (d) made by other means, since 1 May; and if he will make a statement about his Department's policy in respect of making public ministerial announcements. [18888]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 3 December 1997]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 4 December 1997, Official Report, column 320.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) special advisers, (b) task force members and (c) review body members his Department employs; what is the total salary and benefits of (a) to (c); and what was the equivalent cost prior to 1 May. [19305]

Mrs Liddell: The Treasury employs five Special Advisers, four paid and one unpaid. In addition, two paid appointments to the Council of Economic Advisers have been made on Special Adviser terms. Information on the paybill costs for Special Advisers within individual departments cannot be provided, in order to protect the privacy of the individuals concerned. Information on the total paybill for Special Advisers was given in the answers my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave to the hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) on 25 November 1997, Official Report, columns 472–73.

The Private Finance Projects Taskforce (Treasury Taskforce Ltd.) is a private company. It employs nine staff. Salaries and benefits are a matter for the company but the full annual budget will be below the £2.5 million budget for the former Private Finance Panel, which was stood down on 30 September.

The Task Force on Tax and Benefits does not employ any staff. The Chairman is unpaid and does not receive any expenses.

The remaining members of both Taskforces are officials or private sector secondees filling official posts. It is not possible to distinguish the cost of their time spent on Taskforce-related work.

The Chancellor's Department and Agencies do not employ any review body members.

Business Taxation

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of total Exchequer revenues, excluding VAT, have come from business taxation in each of the last five years. [19816]

Dawn Primarolo: The proportion of total revenue from taxes and national insurance contributions that has come from corporation tax, employers' national insurance contributions, non-domestic rates, petroleum revenue tax and other taxes and royalties on business is shown in the table.

Direct taxes on business as a proportion of total tax and national insurance contributions

	Per cent.
1992–93	24.6
1993–94	24.4
1994–95	24.0
1995–96	24.6
1996–97	25.7

The Public Finances

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will restate Table 2.1, page 21, in the "Pre-Budget Report November 1997" to show figures on a cash basis. [19935]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 10 December 1997]: The figures shown in table 2.1 of the "Pre-Budget Report" can be converted onto a cash basis using the projections of money GDP shown in table B.2, page 98.

Overseas Trusts

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will amend United Kingdom tax law to ensure that United Kingdom beneficiaries of overseas trusts are liable to United Kingdom taxes; and if he will make a statement. [19754]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 10 December 1997]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the right hon. Member for Hitchen and Harpenden (Mr. Lilley) on 10 December 1997, Official Report, columns 575-76.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the (a) public sector borrowing requirement on a current balance basis in cash terms and (b) cyclically adjusted public sector borrowing requirement on a current balance basis in cash terms, for (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99, (c) 1999–2000, (d) 2000–01 and (e) 2001–02. [19932]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 10 December 1997]: Table B6 of the "Pre-Budget Report" shows the projections of the public sector current balance as a per cent. of GDP. Estimates of the cyclically adjusted current balance as a per cent. of GDP can be derived from the "Pre-Budget Report" projections of the deviations of output from its trend level, shown in the table, and the published estimates of the effect of changes in GDP on the PSBR, given in the Treasury Occasional Paper "Public Finances and the Cycle". The projections of the current balance and cyclically adjusted current balance as a per cent. of GDP can be converted onto a cash basis using the projections of money GDP shown in Table B2 on page 98 of the "Pre-Budget Report."

Projected deviations of output from its trend level[1] (per cent.)

1998–99: 0

Note:

Central case, in which it is assumed that output was at its trend level in the first half of 1997. A positive figure indicates that output is above its trend. level.

Public Sector

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the policy of the Government in relation to the future net wealth of the public sector. [19953]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 10 December 1997]: The Government believe balance sheet data, including public sector net wealth, provide useful information on the conduct of fiscal policy and the state of the public sector. A discussion paper on the public sector balance sheet has been published as part of the consultation process initiated in the "Pre-Budget Report." Meeting the golden rule over the economic cycle should prevent a repeat of the large fall in public sector net wealth in the first half of the 1990s.

Income Tax

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what factors will determine the timing of the introduction of a 10 pence starting rate of income tax; and if he will make a statement. [19936]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 10 December 1997]: As the Chancellor's "Pre-Budget Statement" made clear, the Government are committed to introducing the 10p starting rate of tax as soon as it is prudent to do so.

Pensioners (Winter Fuel Bills)

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the one-off payments to pensioners to assist with their winter fuel bills will be taxed as income. [20121]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 12 December 1997]: No. These payments will not be taxed.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if his Department has current dealings with (a) non-governmental organisations and (b) suppliers which are not millennium compliant; and on what date his Department will cease to deal with (i) non-governmental organisations and (ii) suppliers which are not millennium compliant. [20528]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 12 December 1997]: CCTA issued detailed guidance in May 1997 on the handling of the Year 2000 problem. The Treasury is implementing this advice. All contractual relationships with non-compliant non-governmental organisations and suppliers who provide strategic goods and services that will be effected by non-compliance will cease on or before the date when the problem takes effect.

Allergic Reactions

Sir Patrick Cormack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people died from allergic reactions to (a) peanuts and (b) other foodstuffs during (i) 1995 and (ii) 1996. [20388]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Sir Patrick Cormack, dated 16 December 1997:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply, as Director of the Office for National Statistics, to your recent question on the number of deaths due to allergic reactions from peanuts and other foodstuffs in 1995 and 1996.

The figures are given in the table:

Deaths certified as due to allergic reactions from peanuts and other foodstuffs, England and Wales, 1995 and 1996

	Peanuts	Other foodstuffs
1996	0	3

Three deaths in 1995 mentioned allergic reaction to "nuts". These have been classified under "other foodstuffs" although they may have involved peanuts.

Carbon Monoxide Poisoning

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many fatalities due to carbon monoxide poisoning there have been in each of the last 10 years. [20723]

Mrs. Liddell: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mrs. Ann Clwyd, dated 16 December 1997:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply, as Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), to your recent question on fatalities due to carbon monoxide poisoning in each of the last 10 years.

The number of deaths in England and Wales from carbon monoxide poisoning (ICD*986) in each of the last ten years are shown in the table.

Year	Deaths
1988	1,524
1989	1,324
1990	1,537
1991	1,508
1992	1,520
1993	1,229
1994	1,206

* International Classification of Diseases, 9th Revision.

For the years 1987–92, the deaths shown were those registered in the year; for the years 1993–96, the deaths are those that occurred in the year.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mr. Horam: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will amend the Financial Services Act 1986 to permit small tranches of capital to be raised for (a) high technology and (b) other SMEs. [20962]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The aim of the Financial Services Act 1986 is to give people the protection and the assurance that they need to have confidence to invest. The Government are mindful of the need to ensure that, in doing this, adequate attention is paid to the costs of compliance and to the need to allow sensible market developments.

The Government are aware of the particular financing needs of high technology firms and small to medium sized enterprises. To this end, my hon. Friend the Paymaster General has recently convened a high level group of industry and government experts to provide early advice on the regulatory and fiscal climate affecting the financing of high technology firms.

Tanzania

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the funds raised under the Christian Aid/Jubilee 2000 Coalition Campaign were applied to reduce the UK's bilateral debt owed by Tanzania; what conditions were attached to the award of funds; and what plans he has to allocate any future funds raised in this way to other countries. [20774]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The funds raised under the Christian Aid/Jubilee 2000 are offset against the UK's bilateral debt with Tanzania. No conditions were attached to this debt reduction. There are currently no plans to use the contributions being made by the public for debt reduction for other countries.

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current value of funds received and distributed by HM Treasury through the Christian Aid/Jubilee 2000 Coalition; and if he will place in the Library a copy of HM Treasury's agreement with the Government of Tanzania relating to the use of these funds. [20775]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The total value of the funds received up until December 15 as a result of the Christian Aid/Jubilee 2000 campaign is £5,050. This is being used to reduce Tanzania's bilateral debt with the UK. We will seek the agreement of the Tanzanian Government to place the relevant correspondence in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what factors he took into account in choosing Tanzania as the recipient of funds sent to the Treasury as part of the Christian Aid/Jubilee 2000 Coalition Campaign on debt cancellation; and what consultation his officials conducted with non-governmental organisations in (a) Tanzania and (b) elsewhere before deciding how to use these funds. [20773]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The use of the Christian Aid/Jubilee 2000 funds to reduce Tanzanian bilateral debt with the UK was agreed by the previous Chancellor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). The Tanzanian Government and Christian Aid were consulted at the time of the Paris club meeting in January 1997 at which debt rescheduling for Tanzania was agreed.

Bingo Halls

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people are employed in bingo halls. [20496]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Brian Jenkins, dated 16 December 1997:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply, as the Director of the Office for National Statistics, to your recent question on the number of people employed in bingo halls.

The number of people who are employed in bingo halls can not be determined to this level of detail. The lowest level which can be provided is for gambling and betting activities (the classification which includes bingo halls as one of the components). Information from the Annual Employment Survey shows that there were 72,500 employees in gambling and betting activities in Great Britain in September 1996.

Paymaster General

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to what extent the Paymaster General is inhibited from altering his involvement with the Orion Trust because of inside knowledge of planned changes in tax law; and if he will make a statement. [20978]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave on 10 December 1997, Official Report, columns 575–76.

Unemployment Statistics

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the answer of 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 573, what steps he plans to increase the accuracy of the method used to calculate unemployment statistics. [21140]

Mrs. Liddell: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Norman Baker, dated 16 December 1997:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply, as Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), to your recent question asking what steps he plans to take to increase the accuracy of the method used to calculate unemployment statistics.

The ONS has recently been reviewing the future presentation and dissemination of labour market statistics. Wide-ranging public consultation was initiated in the May 1997 issue of Labour Market Trends, and a summary of responses was published in the October issue. Responses to the consultation indicated strong support for:

—ONS plans to provide an Integrated First Release covering all Labour Market Statistics;

—the proposals to give increased prominence to data from the Labour Force Survey.

It is taking longer than hoped to put together a comprehensive package which meets users' needs. An announcement about the future of labour market statistics will be made in early 1998.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Overseas Travel

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his estimate of the expenditure by (a) his Department, (b) its agencies and (c) its non-departmental public bodies on overseas travel for (i) 1980–81, (ii) 1987–88, (iii) 1990–91, (iv) 1991—92, (v) 1992–93, (vi) 1993–94, (vii) 1994–95, (viii) 1995–96, (ix) 1996–97 and (x) 1 May to 30 September 1997; and if he will provide a breakdown to show (1) air fares and (2) other expenditure relating to overseas travel. [15255]

Mr. Hoon: Except for the Legal Aid Board—established on 1 April 1989—which incurred £4,215 of such expenditure in 1994–95, expenditure on overseas travel is not monitored separately from other travel and subsistence in my Department and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The Chief Executives of HM Land Registry and the Public Record Office will be replying separately.

Letter from Sarah Tyacke to Mr. Malcolm Bruce, dated 16 December 1997:

I have been asked by the Lord Chancellor's Parliamentary Secretary to reply for the Public Record Office to your question about expenditure on overseas travel by the agencies for which his Department is responsible.

Our accounts systems are not designed in such a way as to allow this information to be produced without lengthy research. I regret therefore that your question could be answered only at disproportionate cost.

Although I stated in answer to a Parliamentary Question tabled in a previous session that the Public Record Office spent £7,708 on overseas travel in 1994–95, my experience of the time taken to produce that figure has guided my reply on this occasion.

Letter from Dr. Stuart Hill to Mr. Malcolm Bruce, dated 16 December 1997:

I have been asked by the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, to reply to your recent question on expenditure on overseas travel. The information is shown below insofar as it is available:

	Expenditure
(i) 1980–81 (ii) 1987–88 (iii) 1990–91 (iv) 1991–92	Figures could only be provided at disproportionate cost
(v) 1992–93	[1] £4,750
(vi) 1993–94	[1] £3,780
(vii) 1994–95	[1] £8,084
(viii) 1995–96	[1] £2,550
(ix) 1996–97	1. Airfares £5,804 2. Other expenditure £5,180
(x) 1 May–30 September 1997	1. Airfares £8,505 2. Other expenditure £1,896

[1] A breakdown of total expenditure for these years is not readily available and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

VAT Appeals

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if NHS trusts are entitled to appeal against a decision of HM Customs and Excise to a VAT tribunal. [19995]

Mr. Hoon: Any organisation that pays VAT, including NHS trusts, can appeal against a decision of HM Customs and Excise to a VAT tribunal.

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the public cost per hour of proceedings in (a) a VAT tribunal and (b) a High Court undertaking judicial review of a disputed VAT ruling. [19994]

Mr. Hoon: The average cost per hour of any proceedings in the High Court is £231.19. This includes the cost of maintaining the court room, paying the judiciary and providing administrative assistance. Detailed information is not collected on the cost per hour of proceedings in a VAT tribunal, but the Court Service estimates it to be about £137. Neither figure includes the cost to HM Customs and Exercise of defending a VAT ruling.

Publicity and Advertising

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his estimate of the total expenditure on all forms of publicity and advertising by (a) his Department, (b) its agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies for (i) 1993–94, (ii) 1994–95, (iii) 1995–96, (iv) 1996–97, (v) the 1997–98, year to date, (vi) the 1997–98, full year estimate and (vii) the 1998–99 planned expenditure. [15257]

Mr. Hoon: Expenditure by my Department on publicity and on advertising (for recruitment of staff and judicial appointments) is shown in the table.

1997–98 (full year estimate)	77,277	258,857	155,000	469,729	1,991

[1] Advertising costs of Public Trust Office prior to 1994–95 are included in LCD Headquarters.

Estimates for 1998–99 cannot be provided as budgets have not yet been determined.

There has been no expenditure on publicity in any of the years specified for the Court Service and the Advisory Committee on Legal Education and Conduct and none is planned for 1998–99.

The only advertising that the Court Service carries out is for recruitment. These adverts are placed locally and, as a result, the amount spent could be established only at disproportionate cost.

It is Government policy that the Public Trust Office does not advertise for the services it provides. The advertising costs shown in the table relate to recruitment of staff. There has been no expenditure on publicity in any of the years specified for the public Trust Office.

The Chief Executives of HM Land Registry and the Public Record Office will be replying separately.

Conditional Fee Agreements

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what research his Department (a) has carried out, (b) has commissioned and (c) plans to carry out and publish concerning the effect of the extension of the use of conditional fee agreements and the withdrawal of legal aid for money claims on solicitors' firms; and at what cost. [21278]

Mr. Hoon: KPMG have been commissioned to undertake an analysis of the business case for a solicitor's firm to undertake money claims under conditional fee agreements without requiring that their clients pay money in advance. The cost of the proposal accepted is £61,000 excluding VAT and expenses.

Official Hospitality

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his estimate of the expenditure by (a) his Department, (b) its agencies and (c) its non-departmental public bodies on official hospitality for (i) 1980–81, (ii) 1987–88, (iii) 1990–91, (iv) 1991–92, (v) 1992–93, (vi) 1993–94, (vii) 1994–95, (viii) 1995–96, (ix) 1996–97 and (x) 1 May to 30 September 1997. [15254]

Mr. Hoon: Expenditure on official hospitality is given in the table.

Data are not available for 1980–81 as this predates the operation of the department's computerised expenditure monitoring systems.

The Chief Executives of HM Land Registry and the Public Record Office will be replying separately.

Letter from Dr. Stuart Hill to Mr. Malcolm Bruce, dated 16 December 1997:

I have been asked by the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, to reply to your recent question on the expenditure on official hospitality. The information is as follows:

(i) 1980–81	Figure not available
(ii) 1987–88	Figure not available
(iii) 1990–91	7,413

Hospitality is defined within the Land Registry as 'Local entertainment costs approved within central guidelines for visitors and/or meetings'. The amounts quoted in the last three years reflect the Land Registry's activities in the international arena with a marked increase in the number and duration of visits by officials responsible for land administration in other countries.

Letter from Sarah Tyacke to Mr. Malcolm Bruce, dated 16 December 1997:

I have been asked by the Lord Chancellor's Parliamentary Secretary to reply for the Public Record Office to your question about expenditure on official hospitality by the agencies for which his Department is responsible.

Total expenditure by the Public Record Office has been:

1993–94	8,298
1994–95	6,752
1995–96	7,120
1 May 1997 to 30 September 1997	8,784

Our pre 1993–94 accounts systems were not designed readily to produce such information and I regret therefore that the figures that you request for earlier years could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Small Claims

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the research that has been commissioned or received into small claims, with special reference to research (a) following up the concerns expressed in the National Audit Office survey relating to unrepresented litigants and (b) concerning how many and what types of litigants and what types of case are unable to proceed without legal help or legal aid. [21279]

Mr. Hoon: (a) My Department has commissioned no research specifically following up the concerns expressed in the NAO survey. However, both Professor Baldwin's recently published book "Small Claims in the County Courts in England and Wales" and the statistical monitoring undertaken by the Court Service are relevant. (b) Consideration is being given as to the feasibility of such a project.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when Professor Baldwin's research into the small claims courts will be published; and what were the terms of reference of his work. [21277]

Mr. Hoon: The report of Professor Baldwin's research "Monitoring the Rise in the Small Claims Limit: Litigants' Experiences of Different Forms of Adjudication" was published on 15 December. He was asked to interview two groups of litigants who had been involved in cases in the range £1,000 to £3,000: a control group whose cases had gone to trial in open court, and those whose cases had been dealt with as small claims arbitrations, and to report his findings.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the factors that underlay the Lord Chancellor's decision to recommend an increase in the small claims limit to £5,000. [21205]

Mr. Hoon The decision was based on a high level of litigant satisfaction with the small claims procedure compared with a lower level of satisfaction with the open court procedure for claims of the same size.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in each year or part year since the small claims limit was increased to £3,000, how many applications were made to rescind the automatic reference to arbitration; and how many of these were granted, broken down by the type of case and the value of the claim. [21276]

Mr. Hoon: The small claims limit was increased to £3,000 in January 1996. During 1996, 712 applications were made to rescind the automatic reference to arbitration, of which 586 were granted. Between January and October this year 696 applications were made and 539 were granted. Details of the type of case and value of claim of those applications that were granted are not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department in each year or part year since the small claims limit increased to £3,000, how many claims have (a) been issued and (b) proceeded to a hearing with the small claims court, broken down by (i) personal injury, other negligence, debt, housing and other, and (ii) by value of the claim in the bands (1) under £1,000, (2) £1,000 to £3,000, (3) £3,000 to £5,000, (4) £5,000 to £10,000 and (5) £10,000 to £15,000. [21271]

Mr. Hoon: The "small claims" limit increased to £3,000 in January 1996.

(a) claims are referred to the small claims or arbitration procedure only if they are defended. It is not therefore possible to identify at the point of issue how many claims will be referred to arbitration.

(b) The details of the number of claims that issued in 1996 that proceeded to a small claims arbitration hearing is as follows:

Type	Under £1,000	£1,000–£3,000	£3,000–£5,000	£5,000–£10,000	£10,000–£15,000	Unliquidated	Total
Personal injury	880	185	0	0	0	1,320	2,385
Other negligence	7,265	1,945	110	35	0	4,660	14,020
Debt	51,190	12,475	955	185	35	3,190	68,035
Non-possession housing disputes	1,140	440	35	0	0	0	1,690
Other	4,405	1,470	75	0	0	1,980	7,925
Total	64,875	16,545	1,175	220	35	11,230	94,050

(The figures are based on a three month sample and are rounded to the nearest 5. "Other" claims include those concerning breach of contract and return of goods).

Details of the number of arbitrations in 1997 have not yet been collated, but will be available early in the new year.

Actions Data

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many actions have (a) been issued and (b) proceeded to trial with a value of between £10,000 and £15,000 in each of the last three years, broken down into personal injury, other negligence, debt claims, housing claims and other claims; and what data he has collated on the average costs of these claims. [21275]

Mr. Hoon: During 1996 the number of actions that were issued and proceeded to trial as follows:

	(a) Issued	(b) Trial
Personal injury	1,720	16
Other negligence	960	16
Debt	14,940	246
Other (including housing)	5,220	63

These figures are based on a two month sample.

The information requested was not collected centrally prior to 1996. This information could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost. In addition, details of the number of actions issued that proceeded to trial during 1997 have not yet been collated, but will be available early in the new year. The information on costs awarded in court was not collected centrally prior to 1997, but will also be available for 1997 early in the new year.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Coal Industry

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on her policy for the future of the coal industry. [18325]

Mrs. Beckett: The Government's policy is to ensure secure, diverse and sustainable supplies of energy at competitive prices. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 1002–03, the Government will be reviewing the long-term energy requirements of the nation, and considering the role of coal will clearly be a part of this process.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the decision was made to extend coal contracts with power stations by three months. [20881]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: This is a matter for the generators and RJB Mining plc.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Government intervened over the coal contracts with power stations for 1998. [20882]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: Negotiation of coal contracts is a matter for the companies concerned but we have encouraged and we continue to encourage the generators and RJB Mining plc to finalise their negotiations on power station coal deliveries beyond March 1988.

Biotechnology

Dr. Kumar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will publish the spending level of the (a) Biochemical Engineering Research Council and (b) Biochemical Engineering Training Council for each of the last 10 years. [19240]

Mr. Battle: In April 1994, the Biotechnology and Biological Sciences Research Council took over responsibility for research and postgraduate training in biochemical engineering from the former Science and Engineering Research Council. The accompanying figures show expenditure (in cash) on research and training over the last ten years. The research expenditure figure for 1994–95 is inflated because the SERC funded the research on the basis of claims whereas the BBSRC uses an expenditure profile. Similarly, the figures for expenditure on training after 1993–94 are best initial estimates, as the data were calculated on a different basis by the two Councils concerned.

Benchmarking

Mr. Cotter: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what guidance has been issued within her Department and agencies on benchmarking; and if any consultation exercises have been undertaken; [19583]

(2) how the system of benchmarking will be used, and what criteria will be adopted, to achieve best value for money functions within her Department and its agencies; [19580]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Benchmarking is a widely used management tool and the DTI's Management Best Practice Directorate has been closely involved in developing and promoting it. The Department has a dedicated central point which can advise on these and other quality tools and put staff in touch with others involved in benchmarking activity both within Government and elsewhere. The Department's own Quality Tool Kit also includes information on benchmarking. No consultation exercises have been undertaken on the use of these techniques.

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will publish the names of all those people who she has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed, and whether they receive remuneration. [19977]

Mrs. Beckett: I list the new appointments made by the Department since 1 May 1997. Those which receive some remuneration are identified with an asterisk.

Export Initiatives

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will publish details of the arrangements under which work previously carried out under the Home Office Export Initiative will be carried out by the overseas trade services section of her Department. [20016]

Mrs. Roche: My Department and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, under the banner of Overseas Trade Services, give advice and assistance to all British companies seeking to trade overseas, including those companies from the security industry. This includes access to help provided under the Export Promoter Initiative and Trade Fair and Overseas Seminar Support Scheme.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions she has had with (a) the Association of Chief Police Officers and (b) trade associations representing the policing and security sector concerning the operation of the export initiative previously managed by the Home Office. [20015]

Mrs. Roche: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer to her by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 11 December 1997, Official Report, column 648.

Oil Exploration Licences

Mr. Evans: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list her responsibilities in respect of issuing licences for oil exploration; what monitoring of companies after the issuing of such a licence is undertaken by her Department, with particular reference to the interpretation of clauses within the licence; what sanctions her Department has available in respect of companies found to have caused environmental damage through breach of their licence conditions; and what action her Department has taken in the past three years against such companies. [20107]

Mr. Battle: The Secretary of State grants licences to search and bore for, and get petroleum within Great Britain and her Continental Shelf. In issuing the licences, I seek to ensure the thorough exploration for and economic exploitation of petroleum, while having due regard to the interests of other users of the sea (where appropriate) and the possible impact of licensed activities upon the environment.

Activities carried out under petroleum licences are subject to the obligations contained in Model Clauses attached to the licence as well as the separate conditions controlling their timing, extent and method. The drilling of wells and the development of any discoveries are subject to separate consents which may attract conditions. Failure to comply with these obligations and consents may lead to the revocation of the licence. Compliance monitoring is undertaken by a team of inspectors based in the Department's Aberdeen office, as well as through returns submitted by licenses about their operations and random surveillance flights carried out on a regular basis.

Where petroleum operations have led to suspected breaches of legislation, then papers have been sent to the Procurator Fiscal for consideration of further action. In 1997, there have been three such cases.

Dounreay

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when her Department received the report from the UK Atomic Energy Authority concerning options for environmental remediation at the Dounreay nuclear waste disposal shaft; and when she expects to take a decision on the proposals. [20760]

Mr. Battle: The UKAEA Board endorsed recommendations relating to the Dounreay Intermediate Level Waste Shaft at its meeting on 4 November. My officials immediately started studying the UKAEA's recommendations. I have since received advice from my officials which I am considering. It is clearly important to allow time to give proper consideration to such important issues and it is my intention to consult the Scottish Office and DETR before making a decision.

Postal Services

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what mechanisms are in place to oversee and regulate operational matters within the Post Office. [20944]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Responsibility for operational matters within the Post Office rests with the Board and management.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans she has to review the arrangements for the regulation of the Post Office. [20945]

Mr. Ian McCartney: This issue will be considered in the context of our review of the Post Office.

Mrs. May: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on the implications of the European Parliament and Council Directive on Common Rules for the Development of Community Postal Services and the Improvement of Quality of Service for the Post Office, and on the timetable for transposing the directive into United Kingdom law. [21110]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Directive provides a regulatory framework for the development of European postal services and is expected to raise service standards and increase competition throughout the EU. Minimal change will be required from our efficient, low cost and profitable Post Office. The Directive must be transposed into UK law within one year of adoption.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if her Department has current dealings with (a) non-governmental organisations and (b) suppliers which are not millennium compliant; and on what date her Department will cease to deal with (i) non-governmental organisations and (ii) suppliers which are not millennium compliant. [20523]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The DTI's own programme of millennium compliance projects is due to be completed by April 1999 and it incorporates activity to ensure that the supply of IT goods and services and other goods containing embedded integrated circuit chips to the Department and exchanges of computer data between the Department and non-governmental organisations are also compliant. This work includes ensuring compliance where such services or exchanges are delivered through or supported by a non-governmental organisation's own IT systems.

Sterling Levels

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations she has received concerning the impact of current levels of sterling on (a) manufacturing and (b) exporting. [20898]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: I receive numerous representations from business about many aspects of economic performance, including the impact of the current level of sterling on the manufacturing sector and exports. Business people tell me frequently that they need macroeconomic stability over the medium term in order to succeed. The economic policies followed by the Government are designed to achieve that stability.

Toyota

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will establish the extent to which the French offered abatement of social and employment regulations for the projected new Toyota car factory. [20915]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: In accordance with the State Aids Framework for the Motor Industry, the French authorities will need to seek Commission approval for aid to the investment project. Abatement of social and employment regulations is unlikely to fit within the criteria of accepted support.

Structural Funds

Mr. MacShane: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps she is taking to secure continued structural fund support for the regions from the European Union. [19398]

Mrs. Roche: Following the publication of the Commission's communication "Agenda 2000" in July, we are discussing the reform of the European Structural and Cohesion Funds with the Commission and other Member States, with the aim of securing a package which is fair to all Member States—especially to the United Kingdom and its regions—affordable and durable, and simpler and more efficient.

Energy

Mr. Garnier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what research her Department has commissioned into the use of coal as a clean source of energy; and how much money the Government are planning to spend on this research. [21291]

Mr. Battle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Mr. Taylor) on 6 June 1997, Official Report, column 276.

My Department has undertaken a detailed review of the UK's future clean coal technology requirements in consultation with industry and universities. This review has just been completed and examined what further support the Government should provide to clean coal technology research, development and demonstration. An announcement will be made about the outcome of the review once Ministers have had time to consider the review's recommendations alongside those arising from the Department's wider Comprehensive Spending Review exercise.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much coal, gas oil and electricity has been imported into the United Kingdom in the calendar years 1992, 1993, 1994, 1995, 1996 and 1997; and how much she estimates will be imported in 1998, 2008, and 2018; and for each of these years, what estimate she has made of the cost of the imports of each of these energy sources. [21274]

Mr. Battle: The latest available information is as follows. Data are only available up to and including the third quarter of 1997. Similar data for the years 1998, 2008 and 2018 are not available. The previous Administration published energy projections for the UK as Energy Paper 65 in March 1995, which is available in the Libraries of both Houses. While these projections implicitly included the contribution from imports to the UK's energy supply, projections of imports themselves were not separately made.

It should be borne in mind that the UK also exports fuels, and has been a net exporter of fuels in both volume and value terms in each year since 1993. In 1996, net exports of fuels benefited the UK Balance of Payments by £4.2 billion. Indications are that net exports of fuels will benefit the UK economy by a similar amount in 1997.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the known extent of the United Kingdom's indigenous sources of coal, gas and oil; and what is her estimate, based on present consumption levels, of when each will run out. [21272]

Mr. Battle: Remaining reserves in present discoveries of oil on the UK Continental Shelf at the end of 1996 are estimated to be up to 2,025 million tonnes. For gas the estimate is 1,960 billion cubic metres. These existing reserves, at 1996 depletion rates, could last for 16 and 22 years respectively. However, additional reserves continue to be discovered each year, and it is therefore likely that production of oil and gas will continue beyond these dates. Allowing for the full potential from as yet undiscovered reserves raises the estimates of reserves to 5,075 million tonnes of oil and 3,795 billion cubic metres of gas. At 1996 depletion rates, total oil and gas reserves could thus last for 39 and 42 years respectively. However these estimates are highly uncertain and future depletion rates will be affected by prices and the utilisation of the UK-Belgium gas interconnector which will provide opportunities for sales into Europe.

For coal, the remaining reserves at existing mines, which could be extracted economically, were estimated to be around 1 billion tonnes at the end of 1994, sufficient for 20 years at current rates of production. However, additional coal reserves in the UK are substantial and their availability and rate of depletion will depend on future energy prices and the demand for coal.

HEALTH

Medical Papers

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many papers published on medical issues which his Department has funded in whole or part have been found to rest on bogus research in the last year. [16682]

Ms Jowell: None as far as the Department is aware. All research reports are peer reviewed and quality assured.

Dialysis Treatment (South Lancashire)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many renal patients from the South Lancashire health area per thousand receive dialysis treatment; and what is the national average. [18152]

Mr. Boateng: Sixty-six South Lancashire residents were receiving renal dialysis as at 30 September 1997. This equates to 0.21 per cent. of population of 310,000. Figures are not collected on the same basis nationally.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) special advisers, (b) task force members and (c) review body members his Department employs; what is the total salary and benefits of (a) to (c); and what was the equivalent cost prior to 1 May. [19307]

Ms Jowell: The Department of Health employs two special advisers.

The number and identity of special advisers in each Department was previously provided in a written answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Surrey Heath (Mr. Hawkins) on 13 November 1997, Official Report, columns 615–17. Information on the total paybill for special advisers was provided in the answers my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave to the hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Kingston and Surbition (Mr. Davey) on 25 November 1997, Official Report, columns 472–73.

The total number of Task Force members is 9; these are all unpaid.

The current number of Review panel and Advisory Group members is 41. All of these are unpaid.

In addition, a Royal Commission into long-term care of the elderly has just been announced which will have 12 members, all unpaid.

Insulin

Mr. Wills: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps his Department has taken to monitor the consequences of standardising insulin strengths; and what have been the results of such monitoring. [19252]

Ms Jowell: The Committee on Safety of Medicines and the Medicines Control Agency are responsible for the continuous monitoring of the safety of all licensed medicines and the safety of insulin is therefore under continuous review. Monitoring the safety of medicines includes assessment of reports of suspected adverse drug reactions, continuous scrutiny of the medical and scientific literature and review of safety reports produced by manufacturers. The Medicines Control Agency is not aware of significant safety issues having arisen as a result of standardising insulin strengths. The Medicines Control Agency and Committee on Safety of Medicines will continue to monitor closely the safety of insulins.

Silicone Breast Implants

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision there is within the NHS in England for women who suffer from ruptured silicone breast implants, to have them removed. [19275]

Mr. Boateng: The decision whether to remove a silicone breast implant is a clinical one between patients and clinicians.

Cancer

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he has taken to improve the identification and treatment of male cancers; what assessment he has made of the use of gene therapy in such treatment; and what plans he has to support research in this area. [19504]

Mr. Boateng: The two major male cancers are testicular and prostate cancer.

Raising awareness of cancer among general practitioners and patients and encouraging them to be alert that symptoms may be due to serious disease such as cancer is an important aspect of the Government's policy for cancer services set out in "A Policy Framework for Commissioning Cancer Services", copies of which are available in the Library.

In September 1995, the Imperial Cancer Research Fund jointly with the Department of Health launched a campaign to encourage testicular awareness through publication of a leaflet entitled "A Whole New Ball Game" so that testicular cancer could be detected early. There have been marked improvements in the treatment of testicular cancer over the last 20 years and now over 95 per cent. of patients can be cured.

Professional bodies in the United States of America and the United Kingdom have published guidelines on treatment of prostate cancer. The Department of Health funded Clinical Oncology Information Network, jointly with the British Association of Urological Surgeons, has produced some further guidelines which are currently out for consultation and are due to be published next year.

The National Screening Committee has recommended that there is currently no case for a national screening programme for prostate cancer. This recommendation has been accepted by Ministers. There is at present no medical evidence to suggest that a screening programme for testicular cancer should be introduced.

Gene therapy for cancer is still at the research stage. At January 1997, 10 gene therapy trials involving cancer were approved in the UK by the Gene Therapy Advisory Committee. None of these involve testicular or prostate cancer. However all cancer research has the potential to lead to developments in the treatment of other forms of cancer.

The main agency through which the Government support medical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council (MRC). The MRC is an independent body which receives its grant-in-aid from the Office of Science and Technology, which is part of the Department of Trade and Industry. The Council is currently co-ordinating four trials in the area of testicular cancer. These are: a randomised trial of two schedules of radiotherapy for stage 1 seminoma of the testis, following orchidectomy; a randomised trial of single agent carboplatin with radiotherapy in the adjuvant treatment of Stage 1 seminoma of the testis, following orchidectomy; a randomised trial of 3 × Bleomycin, Etoposide and Cisplatin (BEP) versus 3 × BEP + 1 × Etoposide and Cisplatin (EP) and the five day schedule versus three days per cycle in good prognosis germ cell cancer; a retrospective study of second cancers following radiotherapy for stage 1.

The Council is co-ordinating two trials in the area of prostate cancer. These are: a double blind placebo-controlled trial of oral sodium clodronate for locally advanced prostatic adenocarcinoma; a double blind placebo-controlled trial of oral sodium clodronate for metastatic prostatic adenocarcinoma.

The Council have recently awarded two grants in the area of male cancers with a total value of £50,000. Research into male cancers is underpinned by a significant amount of basic research relevant to all cancers.

While the Council does not support any work on gene therapy in the treatment of male cancers, it does provide support for more basic research into gene therapy which will underpin and inform future more applied work in the area.

The Department of Health's Policy Research Programme (PRP) is currently undertaking a systematic review of minimally invasive therapy for benign prostatic hyperplasia and cancer. The study is being undertaken at the University of Newcastle at a cost of some £40,000.

A study into the development and clinical evaluation of trans-rectal ultrasound devices for thermotherapy of benign prostatic hyperplasia is currently being undertaken at the Royal Postgraduate Medical School at a cost of £130,000.

In addition another study, a mortality study of cadmium exposed workers with particular reference to lung and prostatic cancer, was completed last year and has reported. The study was undertaken at Imperial College at a cost of £32,000.

The National Health Service Research and Development Programme's Health Technology Assessment (HTA) Programme has also undertaken two studies into prostate cancer.

These are: a systematic review of detection, management and screening for prostatic carcinoma, at a cost of approximately £54,000; a review of evidence on the cost-effectiveness of different strategies for detecting and managing prostatic carcinoma, at an approximate cost of £13,000.

These two studies have reported. The HTA Programme is developing work on treatment for the spectrum of prostate cancers likely to be revealed by a screening programme. If more successful treatments can be developed it may be appropriate to look again at the potential effectiveness of introducing a screening programme at a future date. The HTA Programme is also funding three projects on treatment for benign prostatic hyperplasia, costing £785,000 over four to five years.

The NHS R and D Cancer Programme has funded a systematic review of the early natural history of prostate, skin and oral cancers at a cost of £46,000.

Product Licensing

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will publish the minutes of discussions between the Licensing Authority and Marketing Authorisation holders associated with the granting of product licences; [20509]

(2) if he will publish the recommendations of the Committee on Safety of Medicines. [20510]

Ms Jowell: Discussions associated with the granting of product licences, and the advice of the Committee on Safety of Medicines, are usually confidential between the parties concerned, since they may concern commercially sensitive information.

We are committed to making available as much information as possible. We have therefore asked the Medicines Control Agency to examine its current policies on access to information about medicines. We will consider, in due course, what further action may be necessary to maximise such access while safeguarding legitimate confidential interests. We shall do so, taking account of the White Paper on Freedom of Information we published this month and in the context of European Community licensing and control procedures.

Meals on Wheels

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) those health trusts which charge VAT for meals they provide as part of a meals on wheels service and (b) those that do not. [21137]

Mr. Boateng: The Department collects information on the number of meals prepared and supplied by the National Health Service as part of a meals on wheels service. In the annual collection carried out in autumn 1996, the following local authorities used the NHS to supply some of their meals on wheels: Leicestershire, Surrey, Devon, Somerset, Staffordshire, Calderdale, Stockport, East Riding, and North Yorkshire.

The information collected centrally does not, however, cover the way in which the NHS charges the local authority for these meals.

NHS Appointments

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects appointments to all vacant chairmen and non-executive posts in NHS trusts in Buckinghamshire to be made; and if he will make a statement. [20820]

Mr. Milburn: The outstanding appointments will be made as soon as possible.

Optical Services

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department issued guidance to opticians giving clarification of general ophthalmic services procedures; to what extent the measures it contains are enforceable; what estimate he has made of the regional impact of the procedures on take up of (a) eye tests and (b) free eye tests for those on benefits; and in what areas the advice differs from previous guidance issued by his Department. [20926]

Mr. Milburn: The guidance, issued in November 1997, is only intended to aid understanding of the National Health (General Ophthalmic Services) Regulations 1986 and the National Health Services (Optical Charges and Payments) Regulations 1997. These Regulations set out the statutory obligations which Optometrists and Ophthalmic Medical Practitioners, who contract to provide general ophthalmic services, are required to observe.

The guidance reflects advice given by the Department in response to casual inquiries over recent years and is not expected to alter the trend in the increase in the overall number of sight tests which is currently running at about 2.6 per cent. per annum.

Food Poisoning and Allergy Deaths

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the risk associated with eating each type of food linked with fatal cases of food poisoning, infection or allergic reaction on which his Department collates data. [20768]

Ms Jowell: The Department of Health keeps food poisoning issues under review. The Government are advised on this matter by the Advisory Committee on the Microbiological Safety of Food (ACMSF). The ACMSF has issued the following reports;

Report on Vacuum Packaging and Associated Processes (1993)

Salmonella in Eggs (1993)

Campylobacter (September 1993)

Report on Verocytotoxin Producing Escherichia coli (1995)

Report on Poultry Meat (1996).

Copies of these publications are available in the Library. The ACMSF's reports include assessments of the risks associated with foods and food processes and include recommendations to both the food industry and the consumer.

The Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment is currently considering the factors that influence the development of peanut allergy in infants and young children and is preparing advice to mothers. A report is expected in the spring.

National Institute for Clinical Excellence

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the National Institute for Clinical Excellence can compel local purchasers to buy drugs and treatments of proven effectiveness. [20821]

Mr. Milburn: The National Institute for Clinical Excellence will develop and disseminate clinical guidelines based on relevant evidence of clinical and cost-effectiveness.

It will remain for individual clinicians to judge what is the best treatment for particular patients.

SCOTLAND

Urquhart Castle

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the timetable for his Department's consideration of the Urquhart Castle planning application; and if he will make a statement. [19738]

Mr. Dewar: I am currently considering Historic Scotland's Notice of Proposed Development for improved visitor facilities at Urquhart Castle and expect to reach a decision in the near future on how this proposal is to be processed.

Teaching Quality

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if teaching quality assessment will continue in Scotland after 1998. [21152]

Mr. Wilson: In response to the recommendations in the report of the Committee of Inquiry into Higher Education, the Scottish Higher Education Funding Council have proposed that they cease Teaching Quality Assessment on completion of the current cycle in 1998.

Nurses

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the shortfall in the number of NHS nurses in each specialty in Scotland, by health board area, on 1 December. [21160]

Mr. Galbraith: The information requested is not available centrally, although vacancies, including those which have lasted for more than three months, are monitored at 31 March by the Pay Review Body, and the indications are of a small increase in the levels in 1997 compared to 1996 for Scotland. Contacts with the Service, particularly through the annual exercise to forecast student nurse intakes to colleges five years ahead, do no indicate any general problem, although there are recruitment difficulties for certain specialist areas.

Higher Education

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to establish a Scottish Forum for Higher Education to advise him on the strategic direction of higher education in Scotland. [21154]

Mr. Wilson: I expect to announce a decision, on the Garrick recommendation that I should establish a Scottish Forum for Higher Education, early in the New Year.

Education Standards

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals the Action Group on Scottish Education has made to (a) raise education standards and (b) reduce truancy levels in Scottish schools. [21150]

Mr. Wilson: Implementation of the Government's initiative to raise standards in Scottish schools is being overseen by the Action Group on Standards in Scottish Schools. I chair the Group and membership is widely drawn from within and beyond education.

In September, with the endorsement of the Action Group, we issued for consultation a strategy paper for the development of a framework of school targets in key areas with national introduction in the school year 1998–99. The key areas are, in the first instance, literacy, numeracy and attainment. The outcome of the consultation was discussed by the Group on 15 December. The Group gave broad support to the principle of target setting; agreed that improvement could be achieved in every school; and agreed also that comparability among similar schools was important. The Action Group agreed to meet again in February to take matters forward.

Other areas such as attendance are of critical importance to a school's ability to meet performance targets. In due course, I shall be seeking the Action Group's views on the scope for setting targets in this, and other crucial areas.

Sixth Year Colleges

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if it is his policy to encourage the creation of sixth year colleges in Scotland to teach subjects at advanced higher level. [21149]

Mr. Wilson: My right hon. Friend has no such policy.

Veterinary and Architecture Students

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what additional assistance will be given to (a) veterinary and (b) architecture students beginning degree courses at Scottish institutions in 1998 and later towards the cost of tuition fees for the fourth and subsequent years of their courses. [21155]

Mr. Wilson: Scottish domiciled students beginning degree level courses in veterinary medicine or architecture at Scottish institutions in 1998 or later will be assisted on the same basis as those studying most other subjects. Where the course is one year longer than the comparable course in England and Wales, they will not be liable to contribute to their tuition costs in the final year.

Mature Students

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assistance will be given to students over the age of 50 years beginning higher or further education courses in Scotland in 1998 towards the cost of living and tuition fees. [21151]

Mr. Wilson: Under the new student support arrangements for full-time higher education, students aged over 50 will be eligible for means-related help with tuition fees on the same basis as other students, which means that if they are on low incomes they will continue to receive free tuition.

Under the current student loans scheme full-time students who are aged 50 or over when their course starts are not eligible and we do not plan any changes in those arrangements for academic year 1998–99. We will however be reviewing the position for future years in the context of the move to 100 per cent. loans for maintenance. Both full-time and part-time students in higher education will be eligible for Access Funds from academic year 1998–99, regardless of their age.

Students in further education will not be affected by these changes and will continue to be able to apply for a bursary from their college or education authority, as appropriate.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Slaughterhouses

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the (a) number and (b) distribution of abattoirs in the United Kingdom which are approved for organic livestock; and what is the (i) procedure and (ii) cost of registering as an organic abattoir. [18883]

Mr. Morley: The production standards of the United Kingdom Register of Organic Food Standards (UKROFS) require abattoirs slaughtering organically reared animals to be registered with an approved organic inspection and certification body. Six such bodies exist in addition to UKROFS itself. Registration is designed to ensure that there is an audit trail to demonstrate that meat sold as organic has come from organically reared animals and to provide reassurance on welfare and handling standards. In order to register, the abattoir must demonstrate, to the inspection and certification body, compliance with the requirements. The costs vary, as each body has its own scale of charges, but typically would be in the region of £210 per annum for registration and inspection plus compliance costs, for example of record keeping.

UKROFS holds records of 29 abattoirs certified for organic production: 22 in England, two in Wales, four in Scotland and one in Northern Ireland.

Beef

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food under what circumstances it is permissible to export beef products derived from animals which are over 30 months of age. [20314]

Mr. Rooker: The export of beef products obtained from bovine animals of any age slaughtered in the United Kingdom is prohibited. The re-export of products made from beef obtained from bovine animals slaughtered outside the UK is permitted.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will meet farming representatives regularly in order to update them on progress in lifting the ban on beef exports; and if he will make a statement. [20246]

Mr. Rooker: I have regular discussions with farming representatives which include progress on lifting the export ban. The Scientific Steering Committee has given a positive opinion on the principle of the Date Based Export Scheme. We will be discussing next steps with the Commission shortly. First discussion of the Export Certified Herds Scheme at the Standing Veterinary Committee is expected soon.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what percentage of beef imports to the United Kingdom originate from cattle aged below 30 months; and if he will make a statement. [20247]

Mr. Rooker: Under the Fresh Meat (Beef Controls) Regulations 1996, imported beef sold in the UK must be derived from cattle under 30 months of age at slaughter. There is an exemption from this requirement in respect of beef derived from cattle born, reared and slaughtered in the following countries (which the Government regard as BSE-free):

Argentina
Australia
Botswana
Brazil
Mauritius
Namibia
New Zealand
Paraguay
Poland
South Africa
Swaziland
Uruquay
USA
Zimbabwe.

In 1996 these countries accounted for 48 per cent. of total UK imports. There were no imports from Poland.

Mr. MacGregor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the risk of contracting new-variant CJD as a result of eating beef on the bone; and how this differs from his earlier assessment of CJD risk in eating beef prior to the latest SEAC advice on boning. [20472]

Mr. Rooker: I have published SEAC's view that there is a 95 per cent. chance of no cases and a 5 per cent. chance of one case of new-variant CJD arising as a result of exposure from the dorsal root ganglion in food in 1998. Previous studies did not identify this tissue separately as one contributing to infectivity levels.

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will introduce further controls on specified risk material in Great Britain; if they will apply to imports; and if he will make a statement. [21486]

Dr. John Cunningham: I received advice from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee (SEAC) in May that our existing controls on specified bovine material and heads of sheep and goats should be extended to cover the spleen of all sheep and goats and the spinal cord of sheep and goats aged over 12 months or with one permanent incisor tooth erupted through the gum. In addition, SEAC advised that all the controls should be applied to imports. I was pleased, therefore, when the European Commission adopted in July Decision 97/534/EC which provides for Community-wide controls on the use and destruction of specified risk material (SRM) and for controls on products of animal origin imported into the Community to ensure they are SRM-free. In reaching agreement on that Decision I accepted that the Community-wide controls should take effect from 1 January 1998. However, it subsequently became clear that the Decision would create serious practical difficulties, in particular for importers of pharmaceutical and medical products. The Commission therefore proposed a new Decision to replace 97/534/EC which took account of these problems.

The Standing Veterinary Committee failed to agree on a new Decision to replace 97/534 but did agree to postpone its implementation until 1 April 1998. As I have made clear previously, however, I am not prepared to tolerate any slippage in the introduction of Community-wide controls on SRM. I have therefore decided, in the interests of public health, to introduce unilateral interim controls in Great Britain. I have accordingly laid before Parliament today the Specified Risk Material Regulations 1997 and the Specified Risk Material Order 1997, both of which will come into force on 1 January 1998. Together, these consolidate existing national legislation providing for destruction of certain bovine materials and heads of sheep and goats and extend them to the spleen of all sheep and goats and spinal cord of sheep and goats over 12 months of age. They will also prohibit imports of specified risk material (SRM) except where they are for technical use. Imports of certain animal products for food and animal feed, including imports from EU Member States, will need to be accompanied by official veterinary certification confirming that they do not contain and were not derived from SRM. Products manufactured before 1 January 1998 and those containing material derived from Australia and New Zealand will be exempt from this requirement.

Equivalent legislation is being introduced in Northern Ireland to come into force at the same time.

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of home-produced beef is from (a) steers, (b) heifers and (c) young bulls. [21198]

Mr. Rooker: Between Janaury and October 1997, 54 per cent. of home killed beef and veal by weight was from steers, 30 per cent. from heifers and 16 per cent. from young bulls. Cattle killed under the Over Thirty-month Scheme, Selective Cull and Calf Processing Aid Scheme are not included within home killed beef and veal production.

Fisheries

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the membership, terms of reference and date of reporting of the Review of Fisheries Legislation and Administration he announced in July. [20359]

Mr. Morley: We hope to announce the terms of reference of the Review of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Legislation, and the membership of the review team shortly.

Sheep Annual Premium

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the value of the ewe premium in each EU country. [20367]

Mr. Rooker: The final rate of Sheep Annual Premium for the 1997 scheme will not be set until early in the new year. The latest Commission estimate of the premium per ewe applying in all member states of the EU is ECU 14.206. Balance payments in each member state will be made at the premium rate set, (less advances paid) converted into national currency using the conversion rates applying to the scheme on 4 January 1998. At the current conversion rate the estimated total premium in sterling would be £11.50.

Lambs

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the average market price for lambs for slaughter received by farmers, for each month since January 1995 at British markets. [20366]

Mr. Rooker: The average price of finished lambs is published by the Department in the Agricultural Market Report Part 1, a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library. The prices are collected by the Meat and Livestock Commission on a weekly basis and cover markets in England and Wales.

Retail Butchers and Small Abattoirs

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the factors leading to increases in the running costs of (a) retail butchers and (b) small abattoirs in recent years. [20364]

Mr. Rooker: The Government carry out a cost compliance assessment on the financial implications of all new legislation and the likely effects on small businesses such as retail butchers and small abattoirs. These Regulatory Appraisals (previously known as Cost Compliance Assessments) are placed before Parliament when legislation is laid and are available from the Library of the House. We are not in a position to take follow-up action to determine how accurate are the estimates made, nor to update them for the effects of inflation.

Krebs Report

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the Krebs's Report on badgers and bovine TB. [21012]

Mr. Rooker: I am pleased to announce that Professor Krebs' Report on Bovine Tuberculosis in Cattle and Badgers is published today, as is the Government response to the report.

In November 1996, Professor John Krebs FRS began scientific review on behalf of the then Government into the links between bovine tuberculosis and badgers. His terms of reference were:

> "To review the incidence of tuberculosis in cattle and badgers and assess the scientific evidence for links between them; to take account of EU policies on reducing and eliminating the incidence of tuberculosis in cattle; to take account of any risk to the human population; and accordingly to review, in the light of the scientific evidence, present Government policy on badgers and tuberculosis and to make recommendations".

Professor Krebs was assisted in his review by Professor Roy Anderson FRS, Professor Ivan Morrison, Professor Douglas Young, Professor Tim Clutton-Brock FRS, and Dr. Christl Donnelly, as well as by two research assistants.

The Government are most grateful for the vigour, and rigour with which Professor Krebs and his Team have tackled their remit. They believe that the report represents the best available scientific advice across this difficult area which is of great interest both to farmers, whose livelihood can be badly affected by bovine tuberculosis, and to conservation groups. The Government are disposed to accept the recommendations in the report in principle, subject to further consideration of the public expenditure, legal and practical implications.

The report concludes that the available evidence, albeit largely indirect, strongly supports the view that badgers are a significant source of TB in cattle; but that it is not possible to state how large a contribution badgers make to cattle infection.

The main recommendations are that:

(a) the current policy of limited culling of badgers should end, and be replaced by a policy of no culling in most of the country;

(b) a trial should be set up in certain areas with a history of repeated occurrence of TB to quantify the efficacy and cost effectiveness of badger culling to control bovine TB. Culling of all badgers will take place in some of the trials areas on a carefully designed experimental basis. This will be compared with the culling of all badgers assumed to be linked with bovine TB outbreaks in other trial areas, and no culling of badgers in a last set of trial areas. The aim will be to establish a rigorous scientific foundation for policy in the future, which should benefit all with an interest in this area;

(c) outside the culling trial areas, there should be an experimental comparison of the effectiveness of different cattle husbandry methods in controlling bovine TB. The livestock industry should take the lead here, with help from Government;

(d) the Government's research strategy for bovine tuberculosis should be redirected, and in particular there should be new work on developing a vaccine to protect cattle against TB.

The Government recognise that the subjects covered by the report are of profound concern both to those in badger conservation groups, and to livestock farmers. Account also needs to be taken of the fact that bovine tuberculosis can be transmitted to humans, although the number of cases is very low because of measures such as milk pasteurisation. The Government are therefore setting a period of two months (until 27 February 1998) for comments on how the recommendations should be implemented.

Departmental Wages

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many full-time employees in his department are paid at an hourly rate of between (a) £3.42 and £3.50, (b) £3.51 and £3.75 and (c) £3.76 and £4. [20612]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 15 December 1997]: Staff in the Department and Agencies are salaried and are not paid by the hour. However, I am able to provide a breakdown based on salary levels divided by normal full-time working hours of 36 hours per week in London or 37 hours elsewhere. This is as set out. The figures are based on 1997 salaries which took effect from 1 April.

Farm Animal Welfare

Mr. Gale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals to improve farm animals' welfare he has received from the Council of Ministers to be carried forward during the UK presidency of the EU. [20977]

Mr. Morley: The last time the European Commission submitted a proposal on farm animal welfare for consideration by the Council of Ministers was in June 1997. This was the proposal concerning additional standards for road vehicles used to carry livestock on journeys exceeding eight hours, which is currently under discussion in the Council. We have been pressing the Commission hard—but so far fruitlessly—to bring forward their overdue proposals to update the EU rules on the welfare of laying hens and the welfare of animals and poultry at slaughter, as well as their promised proposal to safeguard the health status of breeding pigs resting at staging points. These are all subjects we wish to progress during our forthcoming Presidency. We will keep up our pressure on the Commission.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Funeral Expenses

Mr. Caplin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the current review of social security will include the system for paying funeral expenses to poor families. [16860]

Mr. Denham: The payment of funeral expenses will not be considered specifically within the current review programme. We will, however, consider whether changes to the scheme are needed during the Department's on-going review of Social Security.

Asbestos-related Diseases

Dan Norris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to protect sufferers of asbestos-related diseases from the provisions of the Social Security Bill in respect of the backdating of claims to one month. [19324]

Mr. Bradley: The proposed rules will provide for up to one month's automatic backdating for non-income related benefits and up to month's backdating of claims for income-related benefits in specified situations. This will include circumstances where the person is ill or disabled and has no relative, friend or adviser to assist them in making a claim. There will also be a number of exceptions which may allow backdating beyond the one month limit.

People suffering from mesothelioma will continue to benefit from the removal of the 90-day waiting period for Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit and the widening of the range of occupations covered for this disease.

Lone Parents

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will estimate the numbers of lone parents who are owner occupiers; and how many such lone parents are in receipt of mortgage interest support. [18085]

Mr. Bradley: The estimated number of lone parents who are owner occupiers is 520,000. The latest available information shows that 97,000 lone parents are in receipt of mortgage interest payments through the benefit system.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants of lone parent premium there were in each year since 1990; and how many new claims for lone parent premium were made in each year. [18083]

Mr. Bradley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when she plans to publish the reports comparing the control groups and the control areas for the New Deal for Lone Parents scheme. [20052]

Mr. Bradley: The final report is scheduled for publication in autumn 1999.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if it is the objective of the New Deal for Lone Parents scheme to get lone parents into full-time work; [20039]

(2) how many of the 433 lone parents who have got work through the New Deal for Lone Parents have full-time jobs; and how many are no longer claiming benefits. [20027]

Mr. Bradley: The objective of the New Deal for Lone Parents is to help lone parents on Income Support improve their incomes by assisting them to take up or increase paid work.

We do not expect that all lone parents moving into work will be able to do so on a full-time basis. There will be individuals whose personal circumstances are such that this will not be a viable option. We know, however, that the majority of lone parents want to work, and we expect that their aim will be to move towards financial independence.

Up to the end of November, 864 lone parents had been helped into work through the Government's New Deal for Lone Parents. Although the majority will have moved into work of 16 or more hours per week, information on the hours of work is not yet available in all cases. Of the 655 cases where information is currently available, 568 lone parents had moved into work of 16 or more hours per week. Of this group, 540 are not currently receiving Income Support.

Mortgage Interest Payments

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to review the mortgage interest rate paid by the Benefits Agency for those on income support. [19351]

Mr. Bradley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) on 30 October 1997, Official Report, column 856.

Tax and Benefit Rates

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the effect on the number of people facing combined marginal withdrawal rates of tax on benefits of (a) 100 per cent. or above, (b) 90 per cent. or above, (c) 80 per cent. or above, (d) 70 per cent. or above, (e) 60 per cent. or above and (f) 50 per cent. or above of cutting the taper on family credit and on housing benefit by 10 per cent., if no other changes were made to the tax and benefit system. [19257]

Mr. Bradley: The information is set out in the table.

Marginal tax rate	Difference in numbers facing high marginal tax rates, following a reduction of 10 per cent. in the family credit and housing benefit tapers
100+	[1]—

1. Figures are rounded to the nearest 5,000.
2. Figures are calculated for benefit units where at least one partner works 16 hours or more.
3. Figures are based on the 1994–95 Family Resources Survey, uprated to 1996–97 levels of prices and benefit rates.

Disability Payments

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate she has made as to the proportion of those currently receiving disability living allowance who would be eligible for employment options under the New Deal programmes. [19466]

Mr. Denham: The Government believe that work is the best form of welfare for people of working age, and we are introducing New Deal programmes to help into work the young unemployed; the long-term unemployed; and lone parents. Those Disability Living Allowance recipients who are also receiving Jobseeker's Allowance will have access to the New Deal programmes for the young unemployed and the long-term unemployed, which will both include opportunities for subsidised employment; and Disability

Living Allowance recipients bringing up children on their own will be able to participate in the New Deal for Lone Parents.

Under our New Deal for people with a disability or long-term illness, we have set aside up to £195 million to finance a range of options aimed at helping participants to move into or stay in work. As a first stage we are this week initiating the bidding process under which we will fund a number of innovative schemes. We also plan to introduce personal advisers to help people overcome barriers to work, initially on a modest scale. These initiatives will inform decisions about how best to offer help to all those sick and disabled people who need it. Under this programme Disability Living Allowance recipients who are not in a job would be offered help to move into work; and where necessary those who already had jobs would be offered help to stay in work.

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has for the future of attendance allowance benefits. [17876]

Mr. Denham: We are committed to creating a modern Social Security system which effectively tackles poverty and welfare dependency, and which provides help where it is most needed. As a first step we are undertaking a comprehensive review of the Department's expenditure. The review is wide-ranging and includes consideration of the complex range of benefits paid to people who are disabled or have health problems. We want to end the exclusion of disabled people; to empower them to play a full part in society, and to develop an approach which focuses on people's abilities and their capacities instead of their disabilities and incapacity.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement as to the planned date of publication of the report on the review of the disability living allowance. [17651]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 November 1997]: We are committed to creating a modern Social Security system which effectively tackles poverty and welfare dependency, and which provides help where it is most needed. As a first step we are undertaking a comprehensive review of the Department's expenditure. The review is wide-ranging and includes consideration of the complex range of benefits paid to people who are disabled or have health problems. We want to end the exclusion of disabled people; to empower them to play a full part in society, and to develop an approach which focuses on people's abilities and their capacities instead of their disabilities and incapacity.

Direct Payments (Fuel)

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures he proposes to take to ensure that eligible households continue to have access to the fuel direct payment method. [19698]

Mr. Bradley: We have no current plans to change the basis of the direct payments scheme which is available to all claimants receiving Income Support and income based Jobseeker's Allowance who meet the qualifying criteria.

Students

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what discussions the Scottish Office Education Department have had with the Department of Social Security on a common definition of a full-time student; and if he will make a statement. [19759]

Mr. Bradley: No discussions have taken place between the two Departments but any proposals for a common definition of a full-time student for Social Security and student support purposes would be subject to consultation with all interested Departments, including the Scottish Office.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate she has made of the amount lost to the Government through benefit fraud for the year 1996–97 in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Scotland. [19233]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 8 December 1997]: The previous Administration estimated the level of fraud at £4 billion a year. This figure relates to Great Britain as a whole. There is no separate estimate for Scotland.

The Government are currently examining the estimate of fraud in the light of further analysis of the findings of the on-going programme of benefit reviews.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total value in today's figures of the national insurance contributions paid by an employee on (a) average industrial earnings, (b) twice average industrial earnings and (c) three times average industrial earnings in the periods (i) 1967–77, (ii) 1977–87 and (iii) 1987–97. [19915]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested as average industrial earnings data are not available. Information based on the average weekly earnings index for male manual employees produced by the Office of National Statistics is set out in the table.

Total contributions paid at November 1997 prices

Period	Average earnings £	Twice average earnings £	Three times average earnings £
1967–77	6,540.85	7,755.96	7,755.96
1987–97	12,476.04	19,877.64	19,877.64

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what uniform rate of employer national insurance contributions would be required on earnings above the lower earning limit to maintain current employer NICs revenues, if employer NICs were to be abolished on the slice of earnings below the LEL. [20992]

Mr. Denham: If this change took effect from April 1998 a single employer contribution rate of 11.6 per cent. would be needed to maintain contribution revenues for 1998–99.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if those aged under 25 years who lose their entitlement to jobseeker's allowance by refusing to take up any of the four options which have been offered to them under the Welfare to Work scheme will also lose their entitlement to any other benefits they are receiving. [20026]

Mr. Bradley: Young people who are sanctioned because they unreasonably refuse to take up one of the four options offered under the New Deal, will lose their Jobseeker's Allowance but retain passported benefits such as Housing and Council Tax Benefit, and other benefits unaffected by the sanction, such as Child Benefit.

Sensory Disabilities

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to increase awareness of existing disability benefits amongst people with sensory disabilities. [20706]

Mr. Denham: Modernising the Social Security System is one of this Government's key priorities. We are committed to ensuring that the benefits system is accessible to all the Department's clients.

The publicity of existing disability benefits is an operational matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from David Riggs to Mr. Steve Webb, dated 15 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security asked Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what plans she has to increase awareness of existing disability benefits amongst people with sensory disabilities. As Mr. Mathison is away from the office on leave, I am replying.

The Benefits Agency aims to ensure that all customers have equality of access to the benefits system. We provide information in alternative formats for people with disabilities, including information for deaf, blind and partially sighted people.

For blind and partially sighted people we currently produce information in braille, large print and on audio cassette. A new edition of FB19, A guide for blind and partially sighted people—social security benefits, will be available for customers in January 1998. Also, in April 1998 we will be re-launching our series of videos for deaf people which will be presented using British Sign Language (BSL) and will be subtitled.

These products are produced in consultation with customer representative organisations in order to ensure that they provide the best possible access for customers with specialist needs. We evaluate and develop these products continuously.

The recently announced overhaul of benefits literature will of course encompass material for people with sensory disabilities and consideration of the most appropriate alternative formats.

I hope that you find this reply helpful.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the estimated savings which will arise from the changes to invalidity benefit and the introduction of incapacity benefit in 1998–99. [21096]

Mr. Denham: We estimate the savings in 1998–99 to be £1,830 million.

Council Tax Benefit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many of the people who will receive reduced council tax benefit under the proposed restrictions will be (a) renters, (b) owner-occupiers with mortgages and (c) owner occupiers who own outright. [20991]

Mr. Bradley: The information is not available in the format requested. The known tenure of benefit units receiving reduced Council Tax Benefit under the proposed restrictions is set out in the table:

000s

Tenure	Number affected
Rented	20
Owner-occupied[1]	25
Not identified[2]	15
Total	65

[1] It is not possible to say how many of these have mortgages, although it includes approximately 10,000 who get help with mortgage interest through Income Support and Jobseekeer's Allowance (income based).
[2] It is likely that the majority of these cases will be owner-occupiers.
1. Information is based on the May 1995 Housing Benefit Management Information System 1 per cent. sample, uprated in line with the forecasts behind the 1997 Departmental Report.
2. Numbers of recipients have been rounded to the nearest 5,000.
3. Total will not sum due to rounding.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Household Growth

9. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of new homes that will need to be built in the Leicestershire countryside to accommodate projections of household growth. [19403]

Mr. Caborn: We have made no such estimate. The number and location of new homes in Leicestershire is primarily a matter for the relevant local authority to consider through the development plan process. My Department has published projections of household growth for counties, but not for areas within them.

Regional Assemblies

10. Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has for a regional assembly for Yorkshire and Humberside. [19404]

Mr. Caborn: Where there is popular demand in individual English regions, we will legislate for the establishment of a directly elected regional assembly—but that is not for the present Parliament.

In the meantime we will build on the arrangements for regional chambers which are being established by local authorities and others on a voluntary basis.

Parish Councils

11. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has for the role of parish councils within regional development agencies. [19405]

Mr. Caborn: Regional development agencies will build on the constructive relationships that the Rural Development Commission has established with parish councils and other local bodies.

Green Belt Land

12. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the Government's policy on new building on green belt land. [19406]

Mr. Caborn: The Government's policy on Green Belts is set out in Planning Policy Guidance note 2. There remains a presumption against inappropriate development in Green Belts unless there are very special circumstances justifying the development which outweigh the harm to the Green Belt.

14. Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the role of the green belt in encouraging economic activity in inner city areas. [19408]

Mr. Caborn: In 1993 my Department published a research study "The Effectiveness of Green Belts" which highlighted the role of Green Belts in helping urban regeneration by encouraging the recycling of derelict and other urban land. Planning Policy Guidance note 2 on Green Belts was revised in 1995 to take account of the research results.

Greenhouse Gases

13. Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the contribution of coal-fired power generation to the output of greenhouse gases. [19407]

Angela Eagle: I refer the hon. Member to "Energy Paper 65", which was published in March 1995. This gives the projections for energy use and energy-related emissions of carbon dioxide for the period 1995 to 2020, and includes projections of power station fuel use and total power station carbon dioxide emissions.

Transport (London)

16. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the proposed Greater London Authority will have powers to invest in London Transport Underground Ltd. [19410.]

Mr. Raynsford: The proposed Greater London Authority, working through the London Transport Authority, will have a duty to produce and deliver an integrated transport strategy for London, which will need to include the Underground. As our Green Paper made clear, the LTA's role should include oversight of the public private partnership for the London Underground which we are urgently developing.

Local Government Finance

17. Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received in response to the changes in SSA announced in the 1998–99 local government settlement. [19411]

Ms Armstrong: We have received a number of representations from local authorities and others on Standard Spending Assessments.

18. Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his review of the mechanisms in respect of local government finance. [19412]

Ms Armstrong: We announced the review of local government finance in July, taking forward our Manifesto commitments, in close collaboration with local government, business and other representative organisations. We will be consulting more widely on possible changes shortly and set out our proposals on Local Government in a White Paper next spring.

21. Siobhain McDonagh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received in response to the changes in economic and social needs indices announced in the 1998–99 local government settlement. [19416]

23. Ms Beverley Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received in response to the changes in economic and social needs indices announced in the 1998–99 local government settlement. [19418]

Ms Armstrong: We have received a number of representations from local authorities and others in response to the changes in the economic and social needs indices announced in the provisional 1998–99 local government finance settlement.

20. Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to make a statement on the outcome of his review into the area cost adjustment. [19415]

Mr. Raynsford: We intend to commission further research to examine the specific cost approach to calculating the area cost adjustment element of standard spending assessments.

The research should report in May 1998. We will discuss its findings with the Local Government Association. Decisions will be taken on Standard Spending Assessments for 1999–2000 next autumn.

Permitted Pollutants (Quotas)

19. Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to introduce schemes to permit the trading of quotas of permitted pollutants. [19414]

Angela Eagle: The Government are committed to implement the best package of instruments for delivering existing and future environmental policy commitments. These in principle may include the trading of emissions quotas, as well as pollution charges or other instruments. There are no current proposals for the introduction of Emissions Quota Trading.

Thames Gateway Initiative

22. Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions which regional development agency will take the lead responsibility for the Thames gateway initiative. [19417]

Mr. Raynsford: The Thames Gateway area will be covered by the Regional Development Agencies for London, the South East and the Eastern Region. It will be for these three Agencies to agree on arrangements for handling issues such as the Thames Gateway, which straddle their boundaries. This will include whether one of the Agencies should take a lead responsibility and, if so, which one should take that role.

Rural Development Commission

24. Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions what will be the role of the Rural Development Commission following the introduction of regional development agencies. [19419]

Mr. Caborn: We are considering this as part of the Comprehensive Spending Review. We expect to reach conclusions in the New Year.

Peripheral Areas (Economic Regeneration)

25. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make it his policy to assist the economic regeneration of peripheral areas of the country. [19420]

Angela Eagle: The Government are committed to pursuing policies that pursue jobs, growth, and competitiveness in a sustainable way that is compatible with protecting the environment and promoting social cohesion. This commitment is put into practice through initiatives such as the Single Regeneration Budget which supports partnership-led projects which address local needs and priorities. Our proposal to establish regional development agencies in England from 1 April 1999 will ensure that these policies and initiatives are taken forward in a way which takes account of all interests within regions—urban, rural, sub-regional and local.

Kyoto Summit

26. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Kyoto summit on climate change. [19421]

Mr. Prescott: This Government are committed to tackling the threat of climate change. The role we played in securing a deal in Kyoto demonstrated this to the world. I will be making a statement on the outcome of the Kyoto conference straight after these questions.

Personal Social Services

27. Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact on social service provision of the change in the level fo the SSA for personal social services. [19422]

Mr. Raynsford: No such assessment has been made, because the impact of any change in the level of the SSA for personal social services depends upon local authorities' decisions on the size and allocation of their budgets.

A3 Hindhead Tunnel

38. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received about the A3 Hindhead tunnel. [19433]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have received a considerable number of representations about the A3 Hindhead Improvement. We are considering these as part of the Roads review.

Rail Underground Integrated Ticketing

39. Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to integrate ticket sales between the rail network and London Underground; and if he will make a statement. [19434]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Train operators and London Transport already have joint ticketing initiatives which cover rail, underground and bus services. We are keen to build on this. It is important that London has a properly integrated transport network, including ticketing. That is why our plans for London governance include establishing a Greater London Authority charged with devising and implementing an integrated transport policy.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

40. Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he will take to encourage the timeous completion of the channel tunnel rail link. [19435]

Dr. Strang: Under the CTRL Development Agreement, London and Continental Railways are contractually committed to completing the rail link within five and a half years of their securing the main financing of the project.

Rail Infrastructure Projects

41. Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to encourage co-operation between Railtrack and train operating companies over infrastructure projects requiring major financial investment. [19436]

Dr. Strang: Railtrack's licence now requires the company to consult train operators more fully on its investment plans. We have given the Franchising Director a remit to secure cost effective investment in the network. We are committed to establishing a new rail authority, with stronger powers to promote investment.

Traffic Calming

42. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to encourage local councils to introduce traffic calming measures. [19437]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Traffic calming is already well established in the UK. it is one of the tools used in managing traffic better and in improving road safety. Traffic calming has proved to be effective in constraining vehicle speed and in reducing the number and severity of road accidents, particularly in residential areas.

The Department provides local authorities with guidance and advice on traffic calming measures through our Traffic Advisory leaflets and day-to-day technical advice.

Transport Noise

43. Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has for noise reduction measures on existing roads. [19438]

Dr. Strang: There are several alternative approaches for reducing the noise of traffic on existing roads which need to be considered more fully. Tackling the problem of traffic noise will be an important element in our Integrated Transport policy which will be published as a White Paper next year.

46. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to provide assistance to people who are subject to the effects of transport noise. [19441]

Dr. Strang: The adverse impacts of transport noise are an important concern for Government. There have been significant reductions in the noise from new road vehicles and aircraft, which have led to marked improvements in the noise climate, although in the longer term projections suggest that without further improvements, previous reductions in noise from vehicles would be offset in many areas by traffic growth. We are considering policies on noise as an important strand in the development of our Integrated Transport Policy, on which we will be publishing a White Paper next year.

52. Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make provisions in the Highways Agency budget to provide greater soundproofing of existing motorways. [19447]

Dr. Strang: There are several approaches to reducing the noise of traffic on existing roads which need to be considered more fully. Tackling the problem of traffic noise will be an important element in our integrated transport policy which will be published as a White Paper next year.

London Underground

44. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he last met London Underground management to discuss the future of London Underground. [19439]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions last met the Chairman of London Transport and the Managing Director of London Underground on 3 December.

European State Airline Subsidies

45. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to meet the European Transport Commissioner to discuss subsidies to European state airlines. [19440]

Dr. Strang: I meet Commissioner Kinnock from time to time, when we discuss a range of aviation and other transport issues.

Integrated Transport Strategy

47. Mr. Prior: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the progress towards an integrated transport strategy in rural areas. [19442]

Dr. Strang: The question of how best to deliver an integrated transport strategy for rural areas is being given full consideration in our fundamental review of transport policy. Our proposals for implementing that strategy will be set out in the forthcoming transport White Paper.

Rolling Stock

48. Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to encourage the purchase of new rolling stock in the privatised railway system. [19443]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Existing franchise agreements already include commitments by franchisees to introduce new rolling stock. However, we want to see even more new rolling stock orders and we expect the rolling stock leasing companies to play a big role in procuring new trains, taking reasonable commercial risks to achieve high levels of investment in the rail industry.

Vehicle Approval Test

49. Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reasons the design of American cars failed the new single vehicle type approval test. [19444]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Earlier this year, some American cars failed the pilot single vehicle approval test for various reasons related to at least one of the following—lighting, rear-view mirrors, interior fittings, exterior projections and deep-tinted glazing. However, the recent proposals to relax the SVA requirements and recognise American standards would reduce the reasons to lighting and, for a few cases only, mirrors and exterior projections.

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many representations he has received expressing concern about the introduction of the single vehicle approval test on 1 January 1998; if he will make delay the introduction of the test; and if he will make a statement. [20709]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 15 December 1997]: We have received nearly 1,600 such representations, the majority of which are pre-printed duplicates. The mandatory aspects of SVA that were due to come into effect on 1 January 1998 for cars originating outside the European Union have for the time being been postponed until 1 May 1998, because the European Commission has instructed us to defer implementing the proposals set out in our recent consultation.

Road Vehicles (Fuel Efficiency)

50. Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to increase fuel efficiency in road vehicles. [19445]

Ms Glenda Jackson: There are a number of measures in place to increase fuel efficiency, including the 6 per cent. annual fuel duty increases announced by the Chancellor in July, the Cleaner Vehicles Task Force and negotiating with the motor manufacturers a voluntary agreement at European level. We will be considering further measures as part of the new climate change programme we will be developing next year.

National Air Traffic Services

51. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the financing of the National Air Traffic Services. [19446]

Dr. Strang: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to her by my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London on 3 November 1997, Official Report, column 63.

We are considering a range of options for the financing of NATS.

Local Government Employees

Mr. David Steward: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions when the review into the political restrictions affecting local government employees will be completed. [19409]

Ms Armstrong: We intend, in the New Year, to publish for consultation any proposals for change resulting from the review.

Lost Shipping (The Gaul)

Mr. Alan Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 20 November 1997, Official Report, column 295, if he will publish the report from HMS Mohawk dealing with her involvement in the search and rescue operation conducted following the disappearance of The Gaul. [20356]

Ms Glenda Jackson: HMS Mohawk was one of several vessels that took part in the search of the Eastern Greenland and Western Barents Seas between 11 and 14 February 1974. The search was co-ordinated from HMS Hermes and a report of the search was filed on 19 February. A complete narrative of events is included at Annexe A of that report. Both the report and the narrative give details of HMS Mohawk's contribution to the search operation. The report has been retrieved from files held by the Marine Safety Agency and copies of the report and the Annexe have been placed in the Library

Mr. Alan Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 20 November 1997, Official Report, column 295, what the (a) contents and (b) sources were of the 13 reports received on the possible location of the wreck of The Gaul. [20353]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The positions reported and their sources were:

25°05'E: RAIRO—Norwegian fishing vessel
72°10'N
27°45.5'E: POSEIDON—German support vessel
72°03'N
25°04'E: MARBELLA—UK fishing vessel
72°13'N:
23°40'E: ELLA HEWITT—UK fishing vessel
72°N
25°E: SWANELLA—UK fishing vessel
71°20'N
28°25'E: ROVER—UK fishing vessel
70°40'N
16°54'E: Unnamed Soviet merchant vessel
71°43'N
27°07'E: ROSS CANAVERAL—UK fishing vessel
71°20'N:
28°25': Norwegian Maritime Authority
72°13'N
24°20'E: MHS RHYL—Royal Navy vessel
71°37'N
29°50'E: LORD NELSON—UK fishing vessel
71°30'N
27°00'E: ST. ROMAN—UK merchant vessel
72°10'N
27°45'E: Norwegian Coastguard Search and Rescue Report.

Mr. Alan Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 20 November 1997, Official Report, column 296, what was the cost of each proposal received to search for the wreck of The Gaul. [20357]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Five proposals were received in the two years following the loss of The Gaul. Their cost estimates ranged from £15,000 to £100,000.

Rail Staff (Redundancies)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many staff employed by (a) the British Railways Board and (b) its successor companies, have been made redundant during each of the last 10 years. [20469]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand from the British Railways Board that, in each year from 1987–88 to 1996–97, the following numbers of British Rail staff were made redundant:

Year	Number of staff
1987–88	2,000 (approx.)
1988–89	2,200 (approx.)
1989–90	1,700 (approx.)
1990–91	850 (approx.)
1991–92	800 (approx.)
1992–93	8,500 (approx.)
1993–94	8,000 (approx.)
1994–95	6,322
1996–97	1,700 (approx.)

Equivalent information for BR successor companies is not available and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Rail Safety

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact on public safety of the changed rules for testing the maintenance and operation of the signalling system recently introduced by Railtrack. [20402]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand that Railtrack's rules and procedures for signalling works testing are set out in mandatory Railway Group Standards. These published engineering standards are amended as necessary from time to time. The safe maintenance and testing of railway signalling is a matter for Railtrack, unless there is reason to believe that their systems are deficient. The Health and Safety Executive has informed me that Railtrack's overall performance in terms of signalling safety demonstrates a high standard, and that it has no reasons at present for major concerns on this subject.

Railways (Station Staff)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many staff were employed on station duties involving direct contact with the public (a) by each of the British Rail train operating units during their final year of operation and (b) by each of the franchised train operating companies in the latest year for which figures are available. [20471]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information requested is not available centrally. British Rail did not maintain records of numbers of staff employed on station duties involving direct contact with the public. Any such figures relating to franchised train operators are an operational matter for them.

Swale Crossing

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received on the need for the second Swale crossing; and if he will make a statement. [20352]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We have received a considerable number of representations on the need for the second Swale crossing, which would be provided by the A249 Iwade–Queensborough Improvement scheme. Most of the representations express strong support for the scheme. We are currently considering all representations as part of the Roads Review consultation.

Ministerial Visit

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his recent visit to India. [20940]

Mr. Prescott: I briefly visited India on 20 November as part of a series of round-the-world meetings I had in the build-up to the United Nations Conference on Climate Change in Kyoto. In India, I met Prime Minister Gujral and Professor Soz, Minster for the Environment and Forests and had useful discussions with them about climate change and transport matters. We were able to work closely with the Indian delegation and other developing countries in the subsequent Kyoto Conference.

Property Transfer Rules

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to complete his Department's review of property transfer rules and house purchase practices. [21022]

Ms Armstrong: Following a successful pilot study, the main stage of a wide-ranging study to track house sales and purchases will commence in January. I expect to be in a position to announce the results of the study next autumn.

Departmental Wages

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many full-time employees in his Department are paid at an hourly rate of (a) £3.17, (b) between £3.17 and £3.50, (c) between £3.51 and £3.75 and (d) between £3.76 and £4. [20604]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The number of staff earning these hourly rates is as follows:

(a) £3.17 an hour: 30

(b) between £3.17 and £3.50: 801

(c) between £3.51 and £3.75: 138

(d) between £3.76 and £4.00: 65.

Road Schemes

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which of the previous Government's road building schemes have been subjected to cost benefit analysis in the course of his Department's Roads Review. [20558]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 15 December 1997]: During their development, all of the previous Government's road building schemes have been subjected to cost benefit analysis. No new information has been collected in the course of the current Roads Review which would enable a new cost benefit analysis to be carried out. Existing information is being reassessed in the light of the five fundamental criteria (accessibility, safety, economy, the environment and integration) identified in the Roads Review consultation paper "What Role for Trunk Roads in England?"

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the guidelines which the Highways Agency follows in determining whether or not it conducts a cost benefit analysis for new road schemes; and what changes he has made to these guidelines since 1 May. [20559]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The Highways Agency carries out a formal cost benefit analysis using the computer program COBA (or, in certain circumstances, URECA) for all new road schemes costing more than £1 million. Schemes costing less than that amount are also subject to economic appraisal conforming to the same economic principles and using the same economic parameters, but may employ less sophisticated methods. No changes have been made to these guidelines since 1 May. A new road assessment methodology is being considered as part of our strategic Roads Review.

London Government

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set out his proposals on the London referendum campaign; if he will make a statement on the costs of (a) his Department's White Paper and (b) publicity campaigns in respect of the referendum; and if he will list the other costs to public funds incurred to date in respect of the proposals. [20409]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 15 December 1997]: It is our intention that the London referendum campaign should inform Londoners of what it is they will be voting on and encourage them to use their vote. The early part of the campaign will highlight, in particular, the availability of votes by post or proxy. The campaign will be factual and neutral. The Government will not provide any state aid to campaigns either for or against the proposal.

The budget allocation for the White Paper is £350,000, which includes the cost of distributing a summary leaflet to every household in London, translating the leaflet in eight languages in addition to English, and producing versions of the leaflet in braille, large print and audio cassette formats.

The total budget allocation for the referendum publicity campaign, including back-up services, is £950,000.

Expenditure incurred to date in respect of our proposals for the Greater London Authority totals an estimated £204,500. This includes £75,000 on the Green Paper and associated summary leaflet, £16,000 on other research, £13,500 on factfinding trips to America, Germany and Spain and approximately £100,000 on departmental staff costs.

Trunk Roads (Staffordshire)

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will conduct a review of the siting of verge safety fencing on trunk roads in Staffordshire. [20556]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency to reply to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Lawrie Haynes to Mr. Brian Jenkins, dated 16 December 1997:

Glenda Jackson has asked me to reply to your recent question about conducting a review of the siting of verge safety fencing on trunk roads in Staffordshire.

A review of verge safety fencing was already commissioned and we expect a report from our agents, Staffordshire County Council, in the early part of next year. As soon as we have had an opportunity to consider the recommendations I will write to you again to keep you informed.

You may also be interested to learn that our programme for installing central reserve safety fencing on existing trunk roads is progressing well. Currently two further schemes are being installed in Staffordshire this financial year. One, on the A38 between Weeford and Bassett's Pole and the other along the A34 between Walton and Darlaston.

I hope this is helpful.

Outdoor Advertising Sites

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the annual cost to the Exchequer of the avoidance of the payment of business rates on outdoor advertising sites; and if he will make a statement. [20715]

Mr. Raynsford: The Department has no information on which to make such an estimate. All property liable for non-domestic rates is to be entered on rating lists, the maintenance of which is the statutory duty of the Valuation Office.

Nuclear Materials

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he was notified that plutonium was being shipped from Sellafield in roll-on roll-off ferries; how many shipments and how much plutonium has been carried since October 1996; how much plutonium and how many shipments are planned in the next 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [20289]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The then Department of Transport was notified of such a shipment in June 1996: a single shipment has since taken place, in October 1996, containing 83 kg of plutonium as non-irradiated mixed oxide fuel. Details of future plans are a commercial matter for BNFL.

Local Authority Pensions

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the impact of his proposals in the local government settlement on local authority pension provision. [19399]

Mr. Raynsford: This year's Local Government Finance Settlement took full account of the pension liability of local authorities.

Driving Licences

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many driving licence holders have had their licences revoked under section 92 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 in each of the past five years. [21232]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number of driving licences revoked on medical grounds for each of the last five years is as follows. The figures relate to great Britain (separate figures for Scotland are not available).

1995: 11,025

Mr. Browne: To ask the secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many persons applying for a driving licence have had a licence refused under section 92 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 in each of the past five years. [21234]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number of driving licences refused on medical grounds for each of the last five years is as follows. The figures relate to Great Britain—separate figures for Scotland are not available.

1993: 5,928
1994: 5,911
1995: 5,602
1997: 6,381 (to date).

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) how many driving licence holders who have had their licences revoked under section 92 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 have appealed under section 100 against the revocation of a licence in each of the last five years; [21233]

(2) how many persons who have applied for a driving licence and have had a licence refused under section 92 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 have appealed under section 100 against the refusal of a licence in each of the past five years. [21235]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information requested is not kept separately for licences which are refused and revoked. The total figures are as follows (figures in brackets relate to Scotland).

1996: 57 (19)
1997: 47 (10) (to November).

Figures for previous years are not available.

Departmental Spending Plans

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he intends to make any changes to the 1998–99 departmental spending plans for which he is responsible. [21373]

Mr. Prescott: The Government are currently in the middle of their Comprehensive Spending Review. We are also working hard on developing an integrated transport strategy, the conclusions of which will be published in a White Paper next Spring.

The Government are committed to retaining public expenditure next year within the overall planned spending limits and some tough decisions have had to be made. Within my Department's total spending ceiling, however, I shall be making some changes. In particular, I shall make some extra resources available for health and safety and environment protection, and make sure that we derive the best possible value from transport expenditure. With the latter in mind, I shall be increasing 1998–99 provision for trunk roads maintenance compared with provision this year to prevent further wasteful deterioration and for grant aimed at taking freight off the roads.

Spending plans for 1998–99 (expressed in £ millions) across my programmes can be summarised as follows:

Programme	1995–96 outturn	1996–97 estimated outturn	1997–98 plans	1998–99 plans
Housing and construction	6,638	[1]5,939	[1]5,118	5,529

[1] This line is reduced to reflect receipts from the sale of the Housing Corporation's loans portfolio of £500 million in 1996–97 and £652 million in 1997–98.

[2] Includes technical adjustments to the Environment Agency's baseline amounting to £2.4 million and a transfer of £2 million from Administration for RIMNET (Radioactive Incident Monitoring Network).

[3] The Department's spending on local government outside of Aggregate External Finance.

[4] 1997–98 figure includes £2 million for Channel Tunnel Rail Link related works but excludes £58 million carried forward from previous years. 1998–99 figure excludes funding for CTRL related works (which has been transferred to the Railways line).

[5] Includes some privatisation effects (receipts from sale of businesses—other than Railtrack—less profits lost when businesses are sold). In particular, for 1997–98 and 1998–99, includes deferred ROSCO (rolling stock company) receipts of £43 million and £26 million.

[7] Includes administration costs and Health and Safety Executive.

[8] Roundings may mean totals do not quite sum. 1998–99 total reflects a £10 million transfer to the Home Office and the surrender to the Exchequer of £10 million which is no longer required because Housing Revenue Account Subsidy debt commutation will not now take place.

Full details of these plans will be set out in the 1998 Departmental Annual Report which is expected to be published in March.

Housing Investment Programme

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends to make an announcement about the distribution to local authorities of capital resources for housing for 1998–99. [21374]

Ms Armstrong: We are committed to providing good quality homes for everyone and today I am pleased to announce a package of funding that will help local authorities provide new homes with registered social landlords, improve the housing stock and help reinvigorate communities.

Councils will receive Housing Investment Programme allocations totalling nearly £770 million for 1998–99. There is £544 million for general purpose allocations, or housing "Annual Capital Guidelines", £166 million for private sector renewal and £59 million for disabled facilities grants.

In addition to Housing Investment Programme allocations, councils will receive allocations under the Capital Receipts Initiative of nearly £570 million. These have been allocated two-thirds in accordance with assessed need and one third in accordance with the total of eligible set-aside receipts generated by each authority between 1 April 1990 and 31 March 1997. These much needed resources will begin to redress years of under-investment in housing.

We have made changes in the way that the HIP resources are allocated by moving away from a fully competitive system to a system which places greater emphasis on need. The HIP allocation has therefore been made half on the basis of need and half on the basis of Ministerial discretion, which takes into account the assessment of each authority's efficiency and effectiveness in meeting housing need in their area.

In addition we are releasing, for the first time, the Government's assessment of all authorities' performance relative to other authorities in the same region. Four factors are assessed: housing strategies, programme delivery, housing management and tenant involvement. Each authority has then been placed in one of four performance bands. Publishing performance bands will encourage authorities to improve their performance, particularly those which are below average.

I am depositing tables in the Library of the House showing each authority's performance band, Annual Capital Guideline, allocations for private sector renewal and disabled facilities grant and allocation under the Capital Receipts Initiative for 1998–99.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the annual production of nuclear waste at (a) Rosyth dockyard, (b) Devonport dockyard and (c) the Atomic Weapons Establishment, Aldermaston, for each year from 1986 to date, broken down by category of waste; and how much of each category of waste is presently held at each site. [19783]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 9 December 1997]: The annual figures for the production of nuclear waste at the Atomic WeaponsEstablishment (AWE) Aldermaston for the years 1986 to date, and the current holding, are set out as follows:

AWE Aldermaston

Year	Low level waste Solids (m^3)	Intermediate level waste Solids (m^3)
1986	3,776	162
1987	1,910	219
1988	824	230
1989	1,350	152
1990	1,775	103
1991	1,512	154
1992	1,594	141
1993	2,205	71
1994	1,676	36
1995	1,626	41
1996	1,728	78
Current holdings on site	487	2,549

The date for Rosyth and Devonport Royal Dockyards is maintained by the companies that now own the Dockyards, as required under the terms of their nuclear site licences.

For Low Level Waste, the figures available from 1986 to date, and shown in the table, are based on the volume of waste disposed of, not the volume of waste produced, but a close relationship between the two may be assumed. Current holdings of Low Level Waste are also shown.

Royal Dockyards—Low level waste (Solids)

1994	127	75
1995	96	126
Current holdings on site (estimated)	31	27

For Intermediate Level Waste, the production figures are not readily available in this form as they do not have to be recorded year on year. Intermediate Level Waste holdings change as new waste is produced, and as accumulated waste undergoes radioactive decay until it changes into Low Level Waste and can be disposed of. There is no straightforward correlation between holding and production figures. Current holdings of Intermediate Level Waste are as follows:

Royal Dockyards—Intermediate level waste (Solids)

Year	Rosyth (m^3)	Devonport (m^3)
Current holdings on site (estimated)	20	25

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many decommissioned nuclear-powered submarines are currently awaiting disposal; where they are presently located; and what estimate he has made of the amount of nuclear material present in each submarine, separated into high, intermediate and low. [19786]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 9 December 1997]: There are 11 decommissioned nuclear powered submarines awaiting disposal. The location of each is as follows:

	Location
Dreadnought	Rosyth
Churchill	Rosyth
Swiftsure	Rosyth
Revenge	Rosyth
Resolution	Rosyth
Warspite	Devonport
Conqueror	Devonport
Courageous	Devonport
Valiant	Devonport
Renown	Rosyth
Repulse	Rosyth

Two of these submarines (Renown and Repulse) are to undergo defuelling, prior to interim storage afloat pending disposal. These are the only submarines which contain high level waste in the form of the spent fuel cores. I am withholding information about the exact amount of high level material contained within the submarines under exemptions 1a–c of the Code of Practice on Access to Government information.

Immediately after the defuelling process there are 75 tonnes of intermediate level material and 140 tonnes of low level material, which will decay in time, in each submarine. Within the intermediate level material there is a mix of long life and short life material, decaying at different rates, and it is not possible to estimate readily the tonnages of radioactive material on individual submarines at this time. During storage afloat, the submarines are regularly monitored and maintained to ensure that they pose no health hazard to dockyard workers or the public.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) special advisers, (b) task force members and (c) review body members his Department employs; what is the total salary and benefits of (a) to (c); and what was the equivalent cost prior to 1 May. [19306]

Mr. George Robertson: My Department currently employs two Special Advisers. Details of remuneration are withheld under exemption 12 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. They were included in the answer given by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the questions from the hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) on 25 November 1997, Official Report, columns 472–73. No MOD Task Forces have been established. My Department has set up one high-level review since 1 May: the Strategic Defence Review. In this context, I have established a panel of 18 experts to provide me with advice. Panel members are unpaid, but may claim expenses.

Vanguard Submarines

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the advantages of modifying Vanguard class submarines to take vertically launched conventionally armed land attack missiles; [20083]

(2) what assessment he has made of the advantages of fitting Vanguard submarines with conventionally armed land-attack missiles launched through torpedo tubes. [20085]

Dr. Reid: No such assessments have been made.

Bosnia

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the budget for booking entertainers on behalf of the armed forces to perform in Bosnia in 1997–98. [20630]

Dr. Reid: The forecast cost of the entertainers booked to perform for British forces participating in the NATO-led Stabilisation Force in former Yugoslavia during financial year 1997–98 is £225,600.

Chinese Government (Visits)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what visits to the United Kingdom by Chinese Government defence officials are planned. [20700]

Mr. George Robertson: A Chinese Army officer is due to attend the Royal College of Defence Studies course starting in January 1998. To date there are no other firm plans for Chinese Government defence officials to visit the UK in 1998, but invitations have been issued to the head of the Chinese Defence Research and Technology Bureau and the Chief of the Chinese Navy.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the British military presence in the Falkland Islands is excluded from the Strategic Defence Review. [21203]

Mr. George Robertson: The Government are committed to sustaining the right of the Falkland Islanders to determine their own future. In the Strategic Defence Review, appropriate provision will be made fully to discharge defence responsibilities in respect of the Falkland Islands.

Royal Irish Regiment

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the tours of duty undertaken by members of the General Service Battalion since 1994 and those planned for the next two years indicating the numbers involved. [20322]

Dr. Reid: In 1994 the First Battalion, The Royal Irish Regiment was stationed in Cyprus as a resident battalion, the manning requirement for which was 539 officers and men. It returned to the United Kingdom in May 1995 and converted to its current primary role of a mechanised infantry battalion with a manning requirement of 625 officers and men. Since then the battalion has completed one six month operational tour in Northern Ireland from December 1995 to June 1996 and on 15 December 1997 it deployed on another such tour, also in Northern Ireland. In both cases the minimum manning strength required is 510 officers and men. On current plans, the battalion is unlikely to be deployed on another operational tour in the next two years.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the duties of part-time members of the Royal Irish Regiment Home Service battalions. [20324]

Dr. Reid: The duties of the Part-Time element of the Home Service are exactly the same of those of the Full-Time element and include foot and vehicle patrols, vehicle checkpoints, helicopter-borne operation, searches and static guard duties.

The Part-Time soldiers of the Royal Irish Regiment Home Service form an important and integral part of the Army in Northern Ireland. The Part-time element supplements the Full Time companies, particularly at nights and weekends and, depending on the security situation, can also provide an enhanced operational capability or operational reserve.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the total salary costs for part-time members of the Royal Irish Regiment in the last year for which figures are available. [20326]

Dr. Reid: The total salary costs for part-time members of the Royal Irish Regiment Home Service from 1 April 1996 to 31 March 1997 were approximately £13,660,000.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 6 November 1997, Official Report, column 321, what were the total staffing levels of the Royal Irish Regiment in December 1997 (i) in total and (ii) broken down (1) into numbers of full-time and part-time, (2) by gender, (3) by perceived religious or community origin of each gender and (4) battalion. [20328]

Dr. Reid: As explained in my answer of 6 November 1997, Official Report, column 324, this information will not be available until early next year. I will write to my hon. Friend when the figures are available.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many part-time members of the Royal Irish Regiment are otherwise (a) employed and (b) unemployed; and if he will estimate the numbers of part-time members of the Royal Irish Regiment falling into each standard occupational category in their civilian roles. [20327]

Dr. Reid: As at 1 December 1997, the number of Royal Irish Regiment Home Service part-time soldiers was approximately 1,870, of whom my Department estimate some 1,520 are otherwise employed and 350 are otherwise unemployed.

Estimates of the numbers of part-time members falling into each standard occupational category in their civilian roles are as follows:

	Number
Managers and Administrators	115
Professional Occupations	50
Associate Professional and Technical Occupations	75
Clerical and Secretarial Occupations	60
Crafts and Skilled Manual Occupations	375
Personal and Protective Service Occupations	30
Sales Occupations	90
Plant and Machine Operatives	340
Other Occupations	385

Province Reserve and Rural Reinforcement Battalions

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the answer of 6 November 1997, Official Report, column 324, what was the overall strength in September (a) 1995, (b) 1996 and (c) 1997 of the Province Reserve Battalion and the Rural Reinforcement Battalion broken down into numbers fully committed to Northern Ireland and the numbers actually deployed there. [20305]

Dr. Reid: The information requested is set out as follows:

	Committed	Deployed
1995
Province Reserve Battalion (PRB)	638	138
Rural Reinforcement Battalion (RRB) (1)	—	—
1996
RRB	419	419
1997
RRB	496	136

Figures as at 30 September. The Rural Reinforcement Battalion did not exist in 1995. At 30 September 1995, its predecessor, the Fermanagh Roulement Battalion (comprising 583 personnel) was fully committed and deployed in the Province.

Patrols

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many patrols were carried out by each battalion stationed in Northern Ireland in the last month for which figures are available broken down by parliamentary constituency or other convenient geographical division. [20306]

Dr. Reid: The information requested for the period 10 November to 8 December (inclusive) is set out as follows, broken down by Police Division and approximate corresponding district council constituencies:

Battalion	Number of patrols	Police division	Approximate district council constituencies
3rd Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment	96	J	Craigavon, Lisburn, Banbridge

1st Battalion the Princess of Wales's Royal Regiment[4]	195	B	Belfast
3rd Battalion the Parachute Regiment[5]	0	D	Carrickfergus, Newtonabbey

A patrol is defined as any foot or mobile patrol in support of the RUC, regardless of size or duration.
Patrols conducted by the Army for local security around bases are not included.
Some battalions operate in more than one Police Division.

Marriage

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what research his Department is undertaking into marriage. [20141]

Mr. Hoon: The Department has commissioned two research projects on marriage which began in April 1997. The first, which looks at individuals' views of marriage over two generations, is being undertaken by Professor Jane Lewis of All Souls College, Oxford and will be completed in March 1999. The second, by One plus One, is the preparation of a series of review papers on the causes, and ways of preventing, marital breakdown. This is due to be completed in March 1998.

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what criteria will be applied in (a) assessing the success and value for money of the 13 projects being financed in 1997–98 in support of marriage and (b) determining whether to renew funding for 1998–99 and beyond for each project. [20142]

Mr. Hoon: The aims of the programme are (i) to identify the types of service which support marriage most effectively; (ii) to increase public awareness of marriage support services; and (iii) to improve access to existing services. The Department will assess the effectiveness of each project in terms of the achievement of its specific aims and objectives and its cost effectiveness.

Whether or not the Department decides to continue funding any of the projects will depend on the results of evaluation and the availability of further resources.

Justices of the Peace

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many justices of the peace there are in (a) England and (b) Wales. [20303]

Mr. Hoon: As at 1 January 1997, the number of Justices of the Peace in England and Wales was as follows:

(a) England: 28,324

(b) Wales: 2,050.

Legal Aid

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will publish his analysis of means testing to determine eligibility for legal aid in the Youth Court when the analysis is completed. [20293]

Mr. Hoon: I will place a summary of the findings of the analysis and of the conclusions in the Library.

PRIME MINISTER

Committee on Standards in Public Life

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement about the appointments to the Committee on Standards in Public Life. [21802]

The Prime Minister: I am pleased to announce four new appointments to the Committee on Standards in Public Life: Sir Anthony Cleaver, Lord Goodhart, Mrs. Frances Heaton and the right hon. John MacGregor. I have consulted the Leader of the Opposition and the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) before making those appointments.

The following existing members of the Committee have been reappointed for a second term: Sir Clifford Boulton, Professor Anthony King, the right hon. The Lord Shore of Stepney, Sir William Utting and Ms Diana Warwick.

I should like to take this opportunity to thank Lord Nolan and those members of the Committee who are leaving after serving their three-year term: Sir Martin Jacomb; the right hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King); the right hon. The Lord Thomson of Monifieth and Dame Anne Warburton. I am grateful for the valuable work they and other members of the Committee have undertaken over the last three years. The Government intend to build on the excellent work they started, with the help of Lord Neill and the new Committee.

HOME DEPARTMENT

"Getting to Grips with Crime"

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses to "Getting to Grips with Crime: A New Framework for Local Action" were received during the consultation period; and if he will make a statement. [21557]

Mr. Straw: Some 545 responses were received, most of them warmly supportive of the Government's proposals. A summary of the main points raised can be found in the Library.

Community Safety Orders

Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses to the consultation paper "Community Safety Orders" were received during the consultation period; and if he will make a statement. [21488]

Mr. Straw: Some 185 responses were received. A list of the respondents and a summary of the main points raised can be found in the Library in a document entitled "Responses to the Home Office Consultation Document on Community Safety Orders".

Departmental Recruitment

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information on recruitment his Department is required to publish; and if he will make this information available for the Home Office for 1996. [21619]

Mr. Straw: The Civil Service Order in Council 1995 authorises the Civil Service Commissioners to require Departments and agencies to publish summary information about their recruitment and the use of permitted exceptions to the principles of fair and open competition and selection on merit.

The number of staff recruited to the central Home Office, including outstations, during 1996 is shown in the following tables. There were two permitted exceptions to fair and open competition and selection on merit in 1996 and this information was published in the Home Office Annual Report 1997.

"In Excelsis"

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what factors underlie his Department's retention of the manuscript of "In Excelsis" containing writings by Lord Alfred Douglas. [21334]

Mr. Straw: The manuscript of the poem "In Excelsis" is contained in a notebook which was issued by the Governor of Wormwood Scrubs prison to Lord Alfred Douglas while he was in custody there in 1924. The notebook was then, and is now, owned by the Crown. It has not been retained by my Department, but is held at the Public Record Office at Kew, where it is open for public inspection.

EU Convention (Criminal Matters)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure there is parliamentary scrutiny of proposals in respect of the EU Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters. [21335]

Mr. Michael: My hon. Friend the Minister of State, the Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Ms Quin), deposited the draft convention for scrutiny on 24 July and made a revised text available on 1 December. She will today give oral evidence about the draft convention to the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities (Sub-Committee E).

Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the nationalities of the people at present being held in the Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre; [20590]

(2) if he will list the periods of time that the people at present detained at the Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre have been held in detention either at this establishment or at other establishments while their cases are being considered; [20591]

(3) how many people were detained at the Harmondsworth Immigration Detention Centre on 1 December. [20589]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: A total of 91 persons were detained at Harmondsworth immigration detention centre as at 1 December 1997.

Information on the duration of current continuous detention, solely under Immigration Act powers, of those persons detained at Harmondsworth immigration detention centre as at 10 December 1997, the latest available date, is given in table 1. Reliable information about previous periods of detention, if any, of those persons can be obtained only through examination of individual case records at disproportionate cost.

The nationalities of those persons detained at Harmondsworth immigration detention centre as at 10 December 1997, the latest available date, are given in table 2.

Rape

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the conviction rate and clear up rate for rape cases expressed as a percentage and in total in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [20593]

Mr. Michael: The Government are very concerned about the low proportion of reported rapes that result in a conviction. The Research and Statistics Directorate in the Home Office is undertaking a study to discover what factors influence whether or not a recorded rape leads to a conviction for rape and whether such factors have changed since a similar study of 1985 cases. I am today placing in the Library copies of an interim report on the processing of rape cases in the criminal justice system. The interim report provides some useful information on where reported rape cases drop out before they reach court. We now need to know precisely why so many cases fail to result in a conviction. This will be covered in the final report, which should be available in the second half of next year.

My right hon. Friend has already announced a number of wide-ranging reforms to make the criminal justice system more swift and effective. In July, he also set up an inter-departmental working group to look at further ways of assisting vulnerable witnesses, including rape victims, which is due to report shortly.

Citizenship Applications

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reduce the length of time taken to process applications for British citizenship. [20460]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Working practices and organisation in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate are currently being looked at internally in order to improve the service to applicants. Next year, the introduction of the Caseworking Programme in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate will produce efficiency savings which will speed up the processing of these applications.

Misuse of Drugs Act

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conditions would have to be satisfied for a drug classified as Schedule 1 in the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 to be reclassified as Schedule 2. [20627]

Mr. George Howarth: The Misuse of Drugs Regulations 1985 allow and govern activities in relation to controlled drugs which would otherwise be unlawful under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. They divide those drugs into five schedules, with those in Schedule 1 being subject to the most stringent controls.

The drugs in Schedule 1 are generally acknowledged to have no therapeutic applications and their use is accordingly confined by international convention and domestic law to research and other special purposes.

Reclassification from Schedule 1 to Schedule 2 would depend upon the therapeutic benefits of a medicinal form of the drug being satisfactorily demonstrated in the United Kingdom, or the United Nations Commission on Narcotic Drugs reducing the international controls on the drug.

Children

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many children have been found not guilty as a result of the operation of the presumption of doli incapax in each year for the last 10 years. [19814]

Mr. Michael: This information is not collected centrally. However a not guilty outcome as a result of the presumption of doli incapax is neither in the interests of the child or children concerned nor in the interests of the public. It is clearly important that the court is not prevented from dealing with the youngster when there is no doubt about the facts of the case.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Concessionary Fuel

Yvette Cooper: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what arrangements she has made to ensure the continued supply of concessionary fuel to ex-employees of British Coal. [21817]

Mr. Battle: My Department took over liability to supply concessionary fuel to ex-employees of British Coal in March 1995. Contracts were placed then with two companies to supply and deliver concessionary fuel over the period from March 1995 up to March 1998.

Following a competitive tender, two-year contracts have recently been awarded to T. H. Fergusson Ltd. in Scotland and Coal Products Distribution Ltd. in England and Wales, to take effect from 30 March 1998. Both companies already supply and deliver solid fuel to other domestic customers.

All fuel supplied will continue to be of high quality and approved for use by HETAS, the solid fuel industry's Heating and Testing Approvals Scheme.

My Department's agents, the National Concessionary Fuel Office (NCFO), will continue to administer the concessionary fuel service, handling all inquiries and claims about entitlements from the beneficiaries.

Because European law on public procurement requires one manufacturer not to be favoured over another, and because fuel prices have changed in relation to each other and the mix of fuels bid into the tender is different from the last tender, it will be necessary to revise the entitlement levels for some brands of manufactured smokeless fuels to ensure that cost of supplying fuel to each beneficiary is equivalent. Higher prices for some brands means this rebalancing will reduce annual entitlements from present levels for those beneficiaries who receive those brands. However, all beneficiaries will have the opportunity either to remain with those brands or to switch to broadly equivalent fuels which will generally provide the same or higher entitlements. Anyone switching to a cheaper brand will receive more than they receive at present.

No-one need change from the fuel they receive now. No-one will be made to change, everyone will be able to make their own decision. Fuller details are being provided to the mining unions this month and to the recipients of concessionary fuel early in the New Year so that they can make their wishes known and stocks can be ordered.

Laser Pens

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps she will take to ensure that class 1 and 2 laser pens are not sold to children under the age of 18 years. [20487]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The Consumer Protection Act 1987 contains a power to make regulations prohibiting the supply of goods to particular classes of people; for example to children under the age of 18 if the goods would be unsafe in the hands of those people. However, to do this we would require clear evidence that there was a safety problem arising from the sale of Class 1 or Class 2 laser pointers to children under 18 years. To date there is no such evidence since all incidents appear to involve Class 3 lasers and above.

On 28 October I acted swiftly in urging Trading Standards Departments to remove from general sale all Class 3 and Class 4 laser pointers as specified under BS EN 60825–Part 1: 1994 (Safety of laser products), because these pointers present an unacceptable risk to consumers. I have been advised by the National Radiological Protection Board that there is no evidence that laser pointers in Class 1 or Class 2 of the BS EN standard can cause a direct risk to health.

Space Programme

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will examine the case for supporting the heat exchanger recently invented by Bristol University within the Government's space programme. [21128]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Innovative research into heat exchangers has been underway at the University of Bristol in recent years and is known to my officials at the British National Space Centre. I am advised that there is a possible application of this research in the field of space transportation.

I can confirm that BNSC will consider the merits of this research as part of an ongoing reappraisal of the prospects for our satellite industry to retain cost effective access to space.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment she has made of the advantages and disadvantages of exempting disabled people from her minimum wage legislation. [20901]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The National Minimum Wage Bill does not treat disabled people differently from the able bodied.

Corporation Tax

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what impact the proposed changes to corporation tax will have on forecast net returns on capital in each of the next four years. [20879]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: Overall, the changes will have little impact on companies' post tax profits, which are of course computed on an accruals basis rather than by reference to cash flow. No company will pay more corporation tax in total as a result of the changes, and from 1999 companies will be free to take a whole range of business decisions without having to worry about ACT and, more particularly, surplus ACT.

Research Expenses (Blind Trust)

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade who are the trustees of her blind trust for research expenses; and if she will publish its trust deed. [20892]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The structure of the blind trust which is used to pay the salary of a member of staff in my parliamentary office was discussed in advance with the relevant House of Commons authorities, who confirmed that it was in full conformity with the rules. I have declared in the register of member's interests the information required about the trust and I have nothing further to add.

Low Pay Commission

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is government policy to accept the conclusions of the Low Pay Commission in full when it reports. [20902]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The Government will give due weight and consideration to any recommendations which the Low Pay Commission makes on those matters referred to it. If, on making the first regulations, the Government decide to act in a different manner from the recommendations of the Commission a report shall be laid before both Houses containing a statement of the reasons for the decision.

Gas-powered Electricity Plants

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what guidance the Government have issued to companies wishing to build new gas-powered electricity plants. [20899]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: Applicants are referred to Planning Circular 14/90 which provides advice to local planning authorities on the section 36 procedure.

Industrial Tribunal Decisions

Mr. Welsh: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate she has made of the number of industrial tribunal decisions which are fully complied with within a period of two months from the tribunal decision. [21174]

Mr. Ian McCartney: My Department does not generally collect data on the payment of awards. However, the most recent survey of Industrial Tribunal Applications (the 1992 Survey of Industrial Tribunal Applications, Employment Department Research Series No. 22) reported that the median time for payment of awards as a lump sum was 7 to 14 days after the hearing. Once an award is made, the payment is a matter for the parties and it can be enforced through the civil courts in the normal manner. To help ensure prompt payment, awards which are paid late attract interest.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what mechanisms are available to ensure the enforcement of industrial tribunal decisions. [21175]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Industrial tribunal awards of money are enforced through the normal mechanisms of the civil courts. In Scotland they are enforced in the same manner as extract decrees arbitral. This means that if payment is not made the creditor may proceed to diligence without requiring to refer to the civil courts for a decree. Diligence is effected in the normal manner for civil debts. To help ensure prompt payment, awards which are paid late will attract interest.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans she has to introduce procedures to allow for easier enforcement of industrial tribunal decisions; and if she will make a statement. [21176]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I have no plans to change the procedures for the enforcement of industrial tribunal decisions. Monetary awards are enforced in a similar way to other awards made by the civil courts.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

St. Margaret's School, Carlton

Sir Nicholas Lyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will decide whether St. Margaret's School, Carlton, Bedfordshire should be closed. [20571]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will announce his decision shortly.

University Admissions

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if he will take steps to encourage universities to publish data on the percentage of state school applications and admissions; [20516]

(2) how many, and which, universities currently publish data relating to the percentage of state school applications and admissions; [20517]

(3) how many, and which, universities currently publish data relating to the percentage of (a) applications and (b) admissions of candidates from ethnic minority backgrounds. [20518]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend welcomes the various Dearing Report recommendations on widening participation and has asked the Higher Education Funding Council for England to give priority in funding additional places to those institutions which can demonstrate a commitment to widening participation. We shall be monitoring the composition of applicants and new entrants to higher education as a whole. It is, however, for individual universities and colleges to determine whether or not to publish data on the characteristics of applicants and new entrants to their own institution. The Department does not keep a record of which universities do or do not publish such information, but we know that the universities of Oxford and Cambridge publish annually an analysis of applications and accepted applicants which includes details of the candidates' previous schooling. The Universities and College Admissions Service (UCAS) routinely provide each higher education establishment with detailed analyses of their applicants and accepted applicants through the bi-annual Management Statistics and the institutional datasets. Ethnicity data are available by institution within the Higher Education Management Statistics, available from the Higher Education Statistics Agency. With the authorisation of the institutions involved, UCAS can provide demographic details of applicants and accepted applicants to each institution.

Key Stage 3

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what percentage of scripts have been remarked in each local education authority for all key stage 3 tests undertaken in (a) English, (b) maths and (c) science; and in what percentage of scripts the (i) scores and (ii) final levels changed. [20671]

Mr. Byers: This information is collected on a national basis only in terms of the number of pupils in the review process and the number of those receiving changes to their test levels. The data are as follows:

	Percentage of pupils reviewed	Percentage of levels changed
English	7	2
Mathematics	0.02	0.001
Science	0.07	0.005

Young Workers (EU)

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received on the incidence of young people from other EU countries taking up paid work for which there are British young people available. [20701]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I have received no such representations. The EU Single Market enables movement of workers of all ages in both directions.

University Grants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the current level of grant to (a) Brunel university, (b) City university, (c) Birmingham university and (d) Coventry university. [20889]

Dr. Howells: The information is set out in the following table.

Institution	Funding Council Grant academic year 1997–98 £ million
Brunel university	28
City university	18
Birmingham university	65
Coventry university	32

Disability Rights Task Force

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will appoint a representative of groups with learning disabilities to the Disability Rights Task Force. [21100]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I refer the hon. Member to the answer provided to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) on 15 December 1997, Official Report, column 7.

Workplace Discrimination (HIV and AIDS)

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to assist companies to prevent discrimination against persons with HIV or AIDS in the workplace. [20716]

Mr. Alan Howarth: We announced on 1 October a three part strategy to secure comprehensive, enforceable civil rights for disabled people. This involves the establishment of a Disability Rights Commission (DRC), a Disability Rights Task Force to undertake a wide review on how to implement such civil rights and the implementation of the remaining rights of access to goods, facilities and services under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 (DDA).

The Task Force met for the first time on 16 December. One of its first jobs in the New Year will be to consider the role and functions of the DRC. We intend to establish a Commission which serves the needs of disabled people and in so doing will work supportively with business.

The Task Force will also consider a wide range of issues concerning comprehensive civil rights and is likely to wish to consider the position of people with HIV or AIDS in the workplace.

At the moment, the DDA protects disabled people—including people with AIDS or HIV infection which affects normal day to day activities—against discrimination by employers with 20 or more employees. We are currently reviewing the position of small employers excluded from the DDA. A booklet "What employers need to know" is available to assist employers in relation to their duties under the DDA and there is also a Code of Practice containing practical guidance for employers. We are considering what other information might usefully be made available to employers.

The Department of Health set up the National Aids Trust (NAT) in 1987, as a fully independent charity. The employers' initiative run by the NAT provides a statement of employment principles for HIV and AIDS and is aimed at assisting employers in the effective management of HIV and AIDS in the workplace, including preventing discrimination against people with HIV and AIDS.

Social Affairs Council

Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the European Union Social Affairs Council on 15 December. [21669]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), and I represented the UK at the Social Affairs Council on 15 December.

The Council passed a Resolution adopting the 1998 Employment Guidelines, and committing Member States to produce National Employment Action Plans in time for examination at the Cardiff European Council in June 1998.

The Council adopted two Directives which apply to the United Kingdom the European Works Council and Parental Leave Directives. It also adopted the Part-time Work Directive, under the procedures set out in the Agreement on Social Policy. A Commission proposal to extend this measure to the UK is expected shortly. There was broad agreement on the extension of working-time controls to sectors excluded from the Working-time Directive. The Council had further discussion on the follow-up to the Davignon report on worker participation under the proposed European Company Statute; and my hon. Friend the Minister of State confirmed that the UK Presidency would aim to make further progress on this dossier under its Presidency.

The proposal for a programme of analysis and research of Member States' employment policies was agreed, with a budget of 30 mecu over three years.

There was discussion on the obligations of Member States to bring civil servants in special schemes within the co-ordination mechanism of regulation 1408/71. I confirmed that the UK intended to make progress with this dossier.

The Council adopted the Directive on the Burden of Proof in Sex Discrimination Cases on the basis of the common position agreed in June of this year. A Commission proposal to extend the directive to the UK will be produced shortly.

The Council had a wide-ranging discussion about the follow-up to the Peking conference on women, and explored what Member States were doing by way of mainstreaming, positive actions, and combating violence against women.

The Commission made presentations on the recent ruling by the European Court of Justice in the Marschall case, and on its Action Plan for the Free Movement of Workers.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Bosnia and Herzegovina

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what is the total level of aid planned to be paid to Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1998–99 (a) directly and (b) via other agencies; and if she will make a statement. [20745]

Mr. Foulkes: Our provisional plans are to spend £5 million from bilateral aid funds in Bosnia in 1998–99.

My Department's contributions to multilateral aid agencies for the coming year are not yet confirmed. Allocations are reported after expenditure.

The expenditure for 1997–98 is expected to be £18.75 million which includes £17 million of emergency aid.

Treasury Committee Report

Mr. Timms: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations she has made to the IMF in respect of the recommendations of the Treasury Committee in its Fourth Report of Session 1996–97 (HC68) that it should establish an independent evaluation unit reporting directly to the Board and publishing its findings. [18352]

Mrs. Liddell: I have been asked to reply to this question on behalf of the Chancellor of the Exchequer who is the Governor of the IMF.

We strongly support an enhanced evaluation function in the IMF and have consistently pressed for an independent evaluation unit. We will continue to do so, but further progress on this is unlikely before the end of next year when the two year trial period for the current limited external evaluations will be completed. We are therefore working to ensure that the existing external evaluation system works as effectively as possible, and take an active role in the Executive Directors committee which co-ordinates the process.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Tourism (East Midlands)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps he is taking to promote tourism in the East Midlands. [20929]

Mr. Tom Clarke: On 26 November my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced that the Government will work with the Tourism Forum to develop a new strategy to maximise the economic and job creation potential of the industry. The strategy will benefit all regions including the East Midlands.

In addition, the Government assists the industry directly by providing grant-in-aid to support the marketing and development activities of the British Tourist Authority and the English Tourist Board.

Millennium Compliance

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if his Department has current dealings with (a) non-governmental organisations and (b) suppliers which are not millennium complaint; and on what date his Department will cease to deal with (i) non-governmental organisations and (ii) suppliers which are not millennium compliant. [20534]

Mr. Tom Clarke [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The Department for Culture, Media and Sport is following the guidance set out in the CCTA's Tackling the Year 2000 guides and is in the process of alerting all non-governmental organisations and suppliers with which it does business of the importance of Year 2000 compliance and of the need for all organisations and suppliers of strategic goods and services to be compliant by 31 December 1999.

Royal Parks

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the annual number of visitors to each of London's royal parks. [20932]

Mr. Tom Clarke: Responsibility for the subject of this question has been delegated to the Royal Parks Agency under its Chief Executive, David Welch. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from David Welch to Mr. Keith Vaz, dated 17 December 1997:

I have been asked by the Secretary of State for Culture Media and Sport to reply to your Parliamentary Question about the annual number of visitors to London's Royal Parks.

The most recent figures relate to 1995. They are based on counts carried out during annual visitor surveys in the parks and are therefore approximate.

Park	Visitors (millions)
Regent's Park (including Primrose Hill)	5
St. James's Park	5.5
Green Park	3.4
Hyde Park	4.7
Kensington Gardens	2.5
Greenwich Park	3.4
Bushy Park	1.6
Richmond Park	2.6

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Jonathan Aitken

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Attorney-General on what date the DPP received a letter from the editor of The Guardian about the alleged perjury of Jonathan Aitken following the collapse of the libel action; on what date she replied; and if he will make a statement. [20383]

The Attorney-General: On 20 June 1997, the Director of Public Prosecutions received a letter from the editor of the Guardian. She replied on 23 June 1997, explaining that the Crown Prosecution Service is not an investigative authority. A complaint against Mr. Aitken was later made to the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, who has appointed a team of officers to investigate the allegations made against Mr. Aitken. That investigation continues. The police, at the conclusion of their inquiries, will forward a report to the Crown Projection Service. This will then be reviewed in accordance with the Code for Crown Prosecutors.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Immigration

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how long on average a person applying for entry clearance for settlement, who was interviewed in November 1997, waited for an interview, at each British post in the Indian subcontinent; and how long those applying for settlement in November 1997 may expect to wait before interview, at each British post in the Indian subcontinent; [20689]

(2) what was the staff complement of the people dealing (a) full time and (b) part time with migration and visa matters at each British post in the Indian subcontinent in (i) December 1995, (ii) June 1996, (iii) December 1996, (iv) June 1997 and (v) December 1997; and how many of these positions were vacant at each date; [20686]

(3) what has been the average period for which a position in the migration and visa staff at each British post in the Indian subcontinent, has remained vacant after a postholder has left over the last three years. [20687]

Mr. Fatchett: In view of the amount of detail needed to answer these questions, my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Baroness Symons, will write to my hon. Friend shortly.

Middle East

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his proposals for the Middle East peach process during the UK presidency of the EU. [21239]

Mr. Fatchett: Seeking to re-inject momentum into the Middle East peace process will be a high priority during our Presidency. We are anxious to see existing agreements implemented in full and progress made on other outstanding issues. We will be pursuing EU proposals which complement and support US efforts. These include a code of conduct to guide future negotiations; a mechanism to institutionalise security co-operation and handle crises; facilitating agreement on implementation of commitments under the Interim Agreement, in particular on Gaza air and sea ports and transit arrangements between the West Bank and Gaza; and engaging Israel in a dialogue on ways of removing obstacles to Palestinian economic development.

Dependent Territories (Caribbean)

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what contingency plans he has in place for dependent territories in the Caribbean in the eventuality of other volcanic eruptions. [21041]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 16 December 1997]: All the Caribbean Dependent Territories have an office of disaster preparedness and disaster contingency plans which are regularly reviewed. These plans take account of the hazards posed by flooding and their principal causes: hurricanes or tsunamis set up by submarine volcanic activity, such a san eruption by the volcano Kick 'Em Jenny, located off Grenada.

Dependent Territories (Internet Services)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions the Commissioner for Pitcairn has had with businesses seeking to create employment on Pitcairn concerning the provision of Internet services to the island; and for what reasons the Commissioner has been seeking to acquire the domain name for Pitcairn from the designated manager. [21045]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The Commissioner is currently investigating ways of improving communications with the Pitcairn Islands to permit Internet access. The Commissioner is seeking to acquire the domain name for Pitcairn in response to a request to this effect form the Pitcairn Island Council.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's policy on Internet services for Pitcairn Island and other dependent territories; and if he will make a statement. [21038]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Existing data communications with the Pitcairn Islands do not permit access to the Intenet. There are therefore no Internet services operating from or within Pitcairn. The Commissioner is currently investigating ways of improving communications so that the Internet can be accessed from Pitcairn. Our policy on issues of this sort is to seek to fulfil the wishes of the individual dependent territory governments.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is the Government's policy to seek to regulate or control domain names on the Internet in respect of United Kingdom dependent territories; and if he will make a statement. [21039]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Our policy is to seek to fulfil the wishes expressed by the individual dependent territory governments. This Department does not generally authorise third parties to administer top level Internet domain names on behalf of dependent territories unless there is some obvious direct benefit to the dependent territories.

Human Rights

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 18 November 1997, Official Report, column 103, what steps his Department has taken to inform other bodies of its support for the broad intentions relating to each United Nations text; and to what extent he has monitored the implementation of the principles contained in the texts. [20329]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Our support for the five United Nations texts, and for the principles which they contain, is recorded in the reports of the UN meetings where the texts were adopted. For the convenience of the House, I have arranged for copies of these reports to be placed in the Libraries of the House today. The texts are recommendatory in nature, and are not legally binding on member States. It is for the relevant home Departments to consider the recommendations contained in the texts, and to monitor their implementation as appropriate.

Gibraltar

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if constitutional change, other than as provided in the Treaty of Utrecht, in the status of Gibraltar is a matter solely for the decision of Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Gibraltar. [21044]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Constitutional change is a matter for the decision of Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Gibraltar provided that it is compatible with the Treaty of Utrecht. We also stand by the commitment in the preamble to the 1969 constitution that there can be no change in sovereignty over Gibraltar without the freely and democratically expressed consent of its people.

NORTHERN IRELAND

RUC Weapons (Losses)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what (a) number and (b) type of RUC issue weapons and of what description have been lost, stolen or otherwise unaccounted for in each of the past 10 years; how many of these weapons are believed to have fallen into the hands of (a) Republican and (b) Loyalist paramilitaries; and how many have been recovered subsequently. [19497]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 10 December 1997]: The information requested for the period 1 January 1988 to 4 December 1997 is set out in the tables. All of the weapons referred to are handguns with the exception of one rifle stolen in 1988 but which was subsequently recovered.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to her answer of 21 November 1997, Official Report, column 321, on how many occasions and at what cost RUC officers travelled to Germany in November and December 1996 for training purposes and how many of them were (i) training German officers, (ii) being trained by German officers and (iii) participating in events involving more than the two forces. [19498]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 10 December 1997]: During November and December 1996 RUC officers travelled to Germany on 9 occasions for training purposes with the Army. Military transport was used at no cost to the RUC.

No training took place with German officers.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to the answer of 21 November 1997, Official Report, column 321, what was the total cost in November and December 1996 of foreign travel for RUC officers on operational duties. [19499]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 10 December 1997]: The total cost of foreign travel for RUC officers on operational duties in November and December 1996 was £35,604.20.

Millennium Compliance

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if her Department has current dealings with (a) non-governmental organisations and (b) suppliers which are not millennium compliant; and on what date her Department will cease to deal with (i) non-governmental organisations and (ii) suppliers which are not millennium compliant. [20521]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 12 December 1997]: My Departments are very aware of the importance of being Millennium compliant. They have taken steps to ensure compliance for the year 2000 by including an appropriate clause in contract documentation for the supply of goods and services. It is difficult to assess at this point in time how many suppliers are not Millennium compliant. However every effort is being made by my officials to encourage companies to become compliant through awareness seminars and liaising with organisations such as industry lead bodies and the CBI.

I have not specified a date when my Departments will cease to deal with non-governmental organisations and suppliers which are not Millennium compliant as the legalities of doing so are as yet unclear.

Euro

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment she has made of the impact on Northern Ireland of the adoption of the euro by the Republic of Ireland. [20772]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 15 December 1997]: Northern Ireland's interests, as part of the United Kingdom, are best served by this Government's policy that the United Kingdom will enter EMU only if the economic benefits are clear and unambiguous and if the people agree in a referendum. Great Britain continues to be Northern Ireland's main export market. The impact on Northern Ireland of the Republic of Ireland entering EMU earlier than the United Kingdom would depend, among other things, on the stability of the sterling/euro exchange rate and the flexibility of local labour markets.

Museums and Galleries

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the Northern Ireland Museums Council was consulted on the preparation of the draft Museums and Galleries (NI) Order 1997. [21133]

Mr. Worthington: Yes.

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what costs have been incurred in advertising for personnel for the Museums Institution for Northern Ireland prior to its being given parliamentary approval. [21131]

Mr. Worthington: No costs have been incurred in respect of personnel solely relating to the new institution. A director has been sought to fill the current vacancies at the Ulster Museum and Ulster Folk and Transport Museum with the intention that this person would in due course become the director of the new institution. Advertisements relating to this appointment have been run on two occasions and cost £26,410 in total.

Advertisements to seek trustees for the Northern Ireland Museums Council and the new body have cost £3,760.

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the individuals and organisations that commented on the draft Museums and Galleries (NI) Order 1997. [21136]

Mr. Worthington: The organisations and individuals who commented were as follows:

Ulster-American Folk Park (Board of Trustees)

Mr. Mackay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the advice of the Museums and Galleries Commission was sought (a) before preparation of the draft Museums and Galleries (NI) Order 1997,

(b) during the consultation stage on the draft Order and (c) following the representations received on the draft Order. [21130]

Mr. Worthington: The advice of the Museums and Galleries Commission (MGC) was sought before the preparation of the draft Museums and Galleries (NI) Order 1997 and during the consultation stage. After this, further consideration was restricted to the Museums Merger Steering Group which includes representatives of the three museums involved in the merger together with independent representatives one of whom is the NI Commissioner for MGC.

Water Fluoridation

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what fluoride compounds are added to public water supplies in Tandragee and Bangor; in what concentration; and by whom they are supplied. [20063]

Mr. Worthington: The fluoride content of the water supply is increased only in water supplied to Tandragee and Holywood. The water supplied to Bangor is not subject to fluoridation. The compound of fluorine used to increase the fluoride content of the water supply is hexafluorosilicic acid.

The fluoridation of water is subject to the provisions of the Water (Fluoridation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1987. Under the provisions of that Order the concentration of fluoride is, so far as is reasonably practicable, required to be maintained at one milligram per litre.

Hexafluorosilicic acid is purchased from a supplier selected by annual tender.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment she has made of the risks to health arising from fluoridation of water supplies. [20065]

Mr. Worthington: The overwhelming scientific evidence has concluded that fluoridation of water supplies at one part per million parts of water is entirely safe. The water service monitors the supply to ensure that the concentration is maintained at this level.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans there are to (a) extend and (b) cease the fluoridation of water supplies in Northern Ireland. [20067]

Mr. Worthington: There are presently no plans to extend or cease the fluoridation of water supplies in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) households and (b) residents receive fluoridated public water supplies in (i) Tandragee and (ii) Bangor. [20069]

Mr. Worthington: The estimated number of households and residents in Tandragee and Holywood normally receiving water supplies with an increased fluoride levels is as follows:

	Number
Tandragee
Households receiving water supplies with an increased fluoride content	1,000
Residents receiving water supplies with increased fluoride content	3,000
Holywood
Household receiving water supplies with an increased fluoride content	1,400
Residents receiving water supplies with increased fluoride content	3,100

The water supplied to Bangor is not subject to fluoridation.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representation she has received in relation to fluoridation at Tandaragee and Bangor. [20064]

Mr. Worthington: I have received 15 representations in relation to fluoridation. Five of the representations related to the fluoridation of Tandragee's water supply.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment has been made of the impact of fluoridation on the (a) dental and (b) general medical health of the population of Tandragee and Bangor.[20066]

Mr. Worthington: No assessment of the effects of fluoridation have been carried out in Tandaragee or Holywood because the population supplied with fluoridated water is too small for a valid statistical assessment to be made. However observation by general dental practitioners and community dentists indicate the patients in Tandragee and Holywood supplied with fluoridated water enjoy better dental health than those who do not receive fluoridated water.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on what basis Tandragee and Bangor were selected as the location for the fluoridation of public water supplies. [20068]

Mr. Worthington: Following encouragement from Government in 1968 Councils responsible for Tandragee and Holywood agreed to introduce fluoridation schemes in these areas.

The water supplied to Bangor is not subject to fluoridation.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Water Service commenced adding flouride compounds to public water supplies at Tandragee and Bangor; and what public consultation preceded such action. [20070]

Mr. Worthington: Fluoridation takes place at the water treatment works serving Tandragee and Holywood. These schemes were both introduced by their respective Councils. The Holywood plant became operational in 1970 followed in 1974 with the opening of the Tandragee plant.

The water supplied to Bangor is not subject to fluoridation.

Housing Executive

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the religious and community background of (i) male and (ii) female clerical officers and clerk/typists in each office of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. [19575]

Mr. Paul Murphy: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, who has advised me that information about the religious and community background of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive's workforce is not published at a level below that of the organisation as a whole. This is published annually in the Fair Employment Commission's Report "A Profile of the Northern Ireland Workforce Summary of the Monitoring Returns". The most recent report for 1996 is available in the Library.

TREASURY

VAT (NHS Trusts)

Mrs. Laing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total performance-related pay received by staff in HM Customs and Excise offices responsible for recovering VAT from NHS trusts in each year since 1990. [20000]

Dawn Primarolo: All pay awards made to all Customs and Excise staff are performance related. No central record is kept of the staff who carry out VAT assurance work on NHS trusts.

Mr. Darling: Yes.

[2] Joint appointment by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Governor of the Bank of England.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what date the Inland Revenue systems will be capable of handling the Euro; and when the Treasury will instruct the Inland Revenue to prepare for sterling joining economic and monetary union. [20317]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue already accept payments in foreign currency and this facility will be extended to the euro. The Inland Revenue, along with other departments, has already started to consider what should be done to prepare for the option of the UK joining the single currency in the next Parliament.

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment the Inland Revenue has made of the impact on its activities of sterling joining economic and monetary union. [20319]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue is reviewing the implications which would arise if the UK were to adopt the single currency.

Declarations of Origin (Israel)

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if Customs and Excise's inquiries into the true origin of products imported from Israel includes (a) dairy products, (b) other agricultural products and (c) manufactured products; and what other products are included; [20348]

(2) when EC officials will meet Israeli representatives to seek a solution to the problem of false origin declarations. [20350]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise are currently awaiting replies from Israel in relation to inquiries concerning textile waste and telecommunications equipment. Israel has undertaken to verify the originating status of orange juice exported to the Community since June 1995 and to complete these inquiries by 10 March 1998. Further inquiries relating to a range of manufactured goods have been suspended following undertakings given by Israel at a meeting with EC officials on 28 November to resolve the doubts concerning the validity of preferential certificates.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when Customs and Excise experts from the Member States of the European Communities will meet to co-ordinate further measures on verifying Israeli; origin declarations. [20349]

Dawn Primarolo: Meetings took place on 28 November and 10 December 1997. A further meeting to agree a common policy is scheduled for 12 January 1998.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when Customs and Excise will report the results of their inquiries into the true origin of products imported from Israel. [20347]

Dawn Primarolo: It is normal procedure for Customs to inform importers when inquiries are sent to Israel. As soon as a response is received the importer is advised.

Green Minister

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the current priorities of the Green Minister within his Department. [20512]

Dawn Primarolo: As the Treasury's Green Minister I am committed to 'greening' the Department's operations, to integrating environmental considerations into other policy areas, and to improving the economic analysis underpinning the Government's environmental initiatives.

The statement of intent on Environmental Taxation, issued with the July Budget, committed the Government to the delivery of sustainable growth. In line with that statement, we are exploring the scope for using the tax system, where appropriate, to deliver environmental objectives. Key current priorities were indicated in the Pre-Budget Report.

Student Suicides

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many students have committed suicide in the current academic year. [20890]

Mrs. Liddell: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Keith Vaz, dated 17 December 1997:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply, as the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), to your recent questions on suicides by students.

In the period 1 September 1996 to 31 July 1997, there were a total of 114 suicides recorded to persons aged 16 and over in England and Wales who were described as 'students' at the time their deaths were registered. These are the latest figures available which approximate to a completed academic year and include deaths where the underlying cause of death was coded as suicide or undetermined injury.

EU Banks and Credit Institutions (Supervision)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what competence the Governing Council or Executive Board of the European central bank will have for requiring its component national central banks to apply common criteria or rules for licensing and supervision of their respective national banks and credit institutions; [21225]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 2 December 1997, Official Report, column 168, if he will make a statement on the treaty responsibilities of the European Central Bank in respect of the licensing and supervision of national banks and credit institutions in the event of UK entry into EMU and its consequent duties in respect of actions of national banks. [21004]

Mrs. Liddell: None. Article 105(6) of the Treaty would allow the ECB to carry out specific tasks concerning policies relating to the prudential supervision of credit institutions but only after legislation by the Council, acting unanimously, had conferred these functions on the ECB. No such legislation has been proposed by the Commission. Under Article 105(5) the European System of Central Banks, including ECB itself, will have an obligation to contribute to the smooth conduct of policies pursued by Member States' competent authorities, relating to the prudential supervision of credit institutions.

Export Transactions

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of British export business was conducted in (a) US dollars, (b) German marks, (c) French francs, (d) other EU currencies and (e) other world currencies in each of the last five years. [21200]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 16 December 1997]: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) on 4 November 1997, Official Report, columns 101–02, on 13 November 1997, Official Report, columns 625–26, and on 24 November 1997, Official Report, columns 358–59.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Packaging Waste

Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will make a statement on his review of the Producer Responsibility Obligations (Packaging Waste) Regulations 1997; and when the review will commence; and what procedures it will follow; [19739]

(2) if he will make it his policy to issue reprocessing certificates under the packaging waste regulations only to those companies which achieve the tonnage of waste in each material for which they have an obligation; and if he will make a statement; [20106]

(3) what representations he has received from the packaging industry concerning the compatibility of the practice of shared responsibility with free market principles; and if he will make a statement; [20105]

(4) what representations he has received from those businesses which are involved with the packaging waste regulations which have insufficient packaging waste arising from their businesses to meet their targets; and if he will make a statement. [20104]

Mr. Meacher: Increasing the recycling and recovery of waste packaging is an important element of achieving a more sustainable waste strategy. The Producer Responsibility Obligations (Packaging Waste) Regulations 1997 are intended broadly to double UK recycling and recovery rates by the year 2001, so that around 50 per cent. of all waste packaging is recovered. These regulations, enacted by the previous Government, are based on an industry agreement reached on 15 December 1995 and, as I have indicated previously, I am keen to ensure that we review their effectiveness and ensure that they fairly reflect that agreement. I accept the importance of an early Review as recommended by the Advisory Committee on Packaging, chaired by Sir Peter Parker, to the then Secretary of State for the Environment, the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), in his letter of 9 July 1996, a copy of which is in the Library.

I have set four broad objectives for the Review:

(i) To determine whether the measures in the Regulations are sufficient to ensure that the UK is on course to meet the targets set by the EC Directive on Packaging and Packaging Waste;

(ii) To identify the scope for increased recycling and recovery of packaging waste so as to make a greater contribution to the UK's sustainable waste management strategy;

(iii) To simplify the Regulations wherever possible, while fulfilling the requirements of the EC Directive on Packaging and Packaging Waste (94/62EC) and maintaining the "shared approach" legal obligation as the basis of the regulations;

(iv) To achieve fairness in terms of the 15 December 1995 agreement on the sharing of the legal obligation between sectors and to encourage co-operation along the packaging chain.

I am asking the Advisory Committee to let me have their recommendations on the best means of achieving these objectives and in addition to look at the following specific issues:

(i) The case for separate targets for household and commercial and industrial recycling, and the scope for strengthening the local authority role;

(ii) The case for additional regulatory measures to encourage minimisation, and reuse of packaging and greater consumer awareness of opportunities to minimise and recycle;

(iii) The effectiveness of current requirements on evidence of compliance and in particular the system of proformas issued by accredited reprocessors (known as Producer Responsibility Notes) and whether this system should be retained in its present form or could be improved;

(iv) How small businesses can best be encouraged to play a part in increasing recycling and recovery levels.

I have asked the Advisory Committee to let me have their recommendations by the end of May and I will consider representations from all other interested parties before determining what proposals to bring forward for public consultation later in 1998.

I have today also received the Advisory Committee's recommendations on the issues on which I asked for their views earlier this year. A copy of their advice is in the Library. With regard to readjustment of the shareout figures in the regulations, I agree with the Committee that the data provided so far this year are not sufficiently robust on which to base a new shareout allocation, and I have asked for further work to be carried out to validate these data, as far as is practicable. I will give further consideration to this and the other issues looked at by the Committee in bringing forward proposals for public consultation next year.

Leasehold Valuation Tribunal (West Midlands)

Jacqui Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will investigate what arrangements the West Midlands Leasehold Valuation Tribunal will make to administer the valuation cases to be submitted on behalf of the Redditch Leasehold Action Committee; and what targets he has set for the maximum time that the leaseholders concerned should expect to wait after submission for decisions. [20462]

Mr. Raynsford: Leasehold Valuation Tribunals are statutorily independent bodies. I understand that the West Midland Leasehold Valuation Tribunal proposes to deal with these cases in batches of about 10 to 25, as submitted by the Agent for the Leaseholders. Applications on this scale have never had to be dealt with before, and the Tribunal has been in touch with the Agents for all the parties concerned throughout. Despite having no powers to issue directions, it is proactively seeking to encourage the parties to identify and narrow the relevant issues prior to the hearings.

The first batch is to be dealt with on 5 February 1998 and the intention is to hear subsequent batches at the rate of one per week.

The West Midland Tribunal, of course, also has to deal concurrently with cases from other parts of their area.

On this basis, the earliest cases will have taken approximately 12 months from receipt of the applications at the Tribunal offices to issue of the decisions, but these cases have been held back at the request of the parties awaiting the decisions on three earlier applications submitted by freeholders.

It is anticipated that, as hearings progress, later cases should be decided in about half that time.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State fore the Environment, Transport and the Regions what public support has been provided to enable a train service from Edinburgh to run direct through the Channel Tunnel or to connect with the channel tunnel service at Waterloo. [20697]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The provision of rail services through the Channel Tunnel is the commercial responsibility of Eurostar (UK) Ltd. (EUKL), which was transferred to the private sector in May 1996. When EUKL (then called European Passenger Services Ltd.) was in Government ownership—9 May 1994 to 31 May 1996—direct grants totalling £423.7 million were made towards running costs and investment. No specific sums were, however, earmarked for the provision of services to or from Edinburgh.

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to assist the development of a high-speed rail link from Edinburgh to the continent via the Channel Tunnel. [20698]

Ms Glenda Jackson: A new high speed rail link between the Channel Tunnel and London St. Pancras is planned to be completed in 2003. This new line, along with the East Coast Main Line, should provide for high speed trains between Edinburgh and the Continent.

Heathrow Rail Link

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) when he expects work on the Heathrow rail link to (a) start and (b) be completed. [20938]

(2) if he will make a statement on the Heathrow rail link. [20937]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Heathrow Express project is progressing well with services due to start in mid 1998.

Railtrack and BAA have taken forward a feasibility study looking at the potential for development of Heathrow–St. Pancras services. Investigations are at an early stage and it is not possible to say whether the scheme will be taken forward.

Kyoto Conference

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list each of the delegations with whom he held meetings at the climate change conference in Kyoto; and if he will place in the Library copies of (a) all papers submitted by the United Kingdom to the conference and (b) all papers made available to the United Kingdom delegation by other parties to the conference in the period up to and including 10 December. [20770]

Mr. Meacher: During the recent climate change conference in Kyoto, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and I held meetings with representatives from the following delegations:

The European Commission and the member states of the European Union

The Group of 77 (represented by Tanzania, India, China, Malaysia, Uganda, The Philippines, Colombia and Iran)

The United States of America

Japan

Australia

New Zealand

India

The United Nations Climate Change Secretariat

In addition, the UK delegation had meetings at official level with a wide range of other countries including Canada, Turkey, Zimbabwe, Russia, Pakistan and St. Kitts-Nevis.

I will shortly place in the Library copies of the Deputy Prime Minister's statement to the Conference and copies of those statements made by other parties which were made available to the United Kingdom delegation.

Heathrow Airport

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is proposing to take to bring to a conclusion the inquiry into terminal 5 at Heathrow. [20941]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None. The conduct and timing of the inquiry is a matter for the Inspector who has been appointed to advise the Secretary of State on the proposed Terminal 5 and associated applications. The inquiry is currently expected to close in the second half of 1998.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what has been the cost to public funds of the Heathrow Terminal 5 inquiry to date. [20942]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The estimated cost to date of the Terminal 5 inquiry to the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, including its agencies, is about £8 million. It is estimated that the local authorities involved in the inquiry have spent around £6.5 million so far.

Opencast Coal Mining

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what conclusions he has reached from the recent consultation on the future of planning policy for opencast coal mining. [21011]

Mr. Caborn: We have not yet reached any conclusion because we are still considering the large number of responses in the consultation exercise.

Housing Repair

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentage of local government housing repairs take longer than four weeks to complete; and what steps the Government are taking to encourage local authorities to reduce that period. [20976]

Mr Raynsford: The information requested is not collected centrally.

The Government remain committed to the Right to Repair scheme, introduced for council tenants on 1 April 1994 as part of the Citizen's Charter initiative. This ensures that certain small, urgent repairs which might affect tenants' health, safety or security are done quickly, within 1 to 7 working days, according to the nature of the problem. The repairs covered by the scheme, and the prescribed periods in which the work must be carried out, are set out in the Schedule to the Secure Tenants of Local Housing Authorities (Right to Repair) Regulations 1994. If such repairs are not carried out by the council within the statutory period, tenants may be eligible for compensation under the scheme.

The Government are keen to encourage all local authorities to perform to the standards of the best in managing their properties, and are discussing with the Local Government Association and others how the new Best Value regime can be developed to achieve this.

Road Safety

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what criteria the Highways Agency uses to evaluate the siting of safety fencing on trunk roads. [20555]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The criteria used by the Highways Agency to Evaluate the siting of safety fences on trunk roads is set down in departmental standard TD 19/85 "Safety Fences and Barriers" which is contained in Volume 2, Section 2 of the Design Manual for Roads and Bridges. A copy of TD 19/85 is lodged in the House of Commons Library. This was amended by the statement made by the then Minister for Roads and Traffic to Parliament on17 December 1986, Official Report, column 535, which extended the provision of safety fencing to all dual carriageway trunk roads where it could be shown that this was justified by the traffic using the road. The Highways Agency together with the Transport Research Laboratory are examining accident data to evaluate the case for extending the provision of protection to roadside equipment and obstructions. If the results of this work indicate that a wider provision is necessary, revisions will be made to the Highways Agency standards in due course.

Capital Receipts (Bolton)

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his estimate of the total capital receipts to be released to the borough of Bolton and over what period; and what proportion will be spent on housing. [20990]

Mr. Raynsford: Under our Capital Receipts Initiative, the borough of Bolton will receive a total of £1.033 million in 1997–98 and £3.305 million in 1998–99. Decisions about levels of funding under the Initiative over the longer term, will be taken in our Comprehensive Spending Review. Information supplied by the borough suggests that in 1998–99 they intend to spend 85 per cent. of these additional resources on housing schemes with the remaining 15 per cent. being used to support housing related regeneration projects.

Airport Signs

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to the answer of 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 547, concerning signs at airports, if she will require those words which do require to be used to appear additionally in other languages. [21141]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 16 December 1997]: No. Airports already provide supporting information in foreign languages where there is a specific need in a particular part of the airport. But to require the inclusion of foreign languages on signs would risk making them more difficult for passengers to absorb quickly, and would risk offending those whose languages were not used. If the hon. Member has a specific need at a particular airport in mind, he may like to discuss it with the airport management concerned.

I am also taking this opportunity to clarify the answer which I gave to the hon. Member on 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 547. The UK follows the Recommended Practice on international signs contained in the Chicago Convention, Annex 9, provision 6.9, which is that the international signs published jointly by the International Civil Aviation Organisation and the International Maritime Organisation should be used at airports and ports. Among the general principles set out in the joint publication (Document 9636) are that as far as possible symbols should be used without words on signs at airports and ports.

Local Transport Infrastructure

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will announce the allocation of capital resources for expenditure on local transport infrastructure in 1998–99. [21611]

Dr. Strang: This year a total of £623 million is to be allocated to local highway authorities and passenger transport authorities in England for capital expenditure on their transport infrastructure in 1998–99. This consists of £155 million in transport supplementary grant (TSG), £40 million for Croydon Tramlink and around £427 million in annual capital guideline (ACG), supplementary credit approval (SCA), grant under section 56 of the Transport Act 1968 and grant under section 13 of the Industrial Development Act 1982.

In this year's settlement I am allocating resources to 10 new packages, of transport measures in addition to the 61 packages which are already being funded. A further six authorities will receive allocations to pursue specific measures in packages that are not yet ready for full acceptance. The total allocated to packages is increased by £6 million to £85 million. The West Midlands metropolitan package will enjoy a rise of £1.175 million to allow accelerated progress on its bus-based strategy. The Avon package sees an increase of £1 million to deliver integrated transport measures in the Bristol, Bath and Weston-super-Mare areas.

In addition to increased funding for multi-modal packages in 1998–99 we are raising the allocations for cross boundary projects in London which we judge to be the way to promote alternatives to the car in the capital. Support for the London Bus Priority Network rises by £2 million to £11 million, and the London Cycle Network gains a further £1 million to reach £5 million, £40 million goes to Croydon's Tramlink project now in progress.

In Manchester £7.2 million is allocated to help with rebuilding the city centre following the IRA bombing.

In a year of tight budgetary pressures these initiatives confirm the Government's resolve to pursue integrated transport policies which will reduce traffic by promoting sustainable alternatives to the private car.

Safety is of primary importance. The £50 million allocated for improvements in locations with a poor accident record will keep up the momentum in the drive to meet current casualty reduction targets. The extra resources for transport packages will enhance safety even further by reducing traffic, calming that which remains, and furnishing better facilities for cycling, walking and public transport.

A sum of £180 million is being allocated for the structural maintenance of principal roads, and the assessment, strengthening and structural maintenance of bridges.

The allocation for major schemes already being supported is £280 million in 1998–99.

Table 1 sets out the national totals for different types of expenditure. Table 2 shows the total amounts of grant, credit approvals and gross approved expenditure for each of the 149 local highway authorities, and the 6 passenger transport authorities. The Government Offices for the Regions are notifying them today of their allocations. Table 3 lists the allocations to transport packages. Copies of the tables have been placed in the Library.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what resources he will make available to authorities that have been or are to be reorganised on 1 April 1996, 1997 or 1998 for reorganisation costs incurred by them in 1998–99; and if he will make a statement. [21612]

Ms Armstrong: On 10 October I invited all authorities which are eligible to participate in the Local Government Reorganisation Costs Scheme for 1998–99, and which have been or are to be reorganised on or before 1 April 1998, to submit estimates of the amount of expenditure they expect to incur on transitional costs of reorganisation in 1998–99. On the basis, inter alia, of the information provided by the authorities, I have decided the maximum amounts that it would be appropriate to allocate towards such costs.

Thameslink 2000

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the application by Railtrack for an order under the Transport and Works Act 1992 in respect of the Thameslink 2000 project is to be referred to Parliament as a scheme involving proposals of national significance. [21618]

Dr. Strang: Whilst my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State agrees that the proposals in the draft Railtrack (Thameslink 2000) Order are important for London, he does not consider them to be of sufficient significance in national terms to fall within section 9 of the 1992 Act. The application will not therefore be referred to Parliament under the provisions of that section of the Act.

Planning Blight

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the report of the interdepartmental working group on blight; and if he will make a statement. [21664]

Mr. Caborn: I have today placed copies of the final report of the Interdepartmental Working Group on Blight in the Library. The report is accompanied by a draft Code of Practice on the dissemination of information during the various stages of major infrastructure developments. I have also deposited copies of the report of the research conducted by the City University Business School into the operation of compulsory purchase orders which is published today by the Stationery Office.

The Interdepartmental Working Group on Blight was set up to review the scope, cause and effects of blight arising during the various stages of major infrastructure projects and to consider whether any practical changes can be made to the existing arrangements for property purchase and compensation throughout Great Britain.

The Group has identified a number of options. One relates to the desirability of improving information flows at all stages of major infrastructure developments, and this provided the impetus for the Code of Practice. A further tranche of recommendations relates to relatively small-scale amendments to existing legislation. However, one recommendation (that a new property purchase guarantee and compensation scheme should be devised) would, if it were accepted, involve major changes to legislation. I should emphasise that this recommendation, which is born of a desire to reduce or eliminate generalised blight, does not undermine the fundamentals of the existing blight and compensation arrangements.

The Group points out that although the focus of the review was generalised blight consequent upon proposals for major infrastructure projects, responses to the discussion paper issued in June last year suggested that the most effective remedy might lie in changes to the arrangements for addressing statutory blight. However, the Group, in seeking to ameliorate the worst effects of generalised blight in this way, has not sought to reassess compulsory purchase and compensation law in its entirety, nor has it considered it consistent with its terms of reference to recommend changes to the law which are not germane to the issue of generalised blight.

The Group has delivered a detailed report on a subject of some complexity. None of the issues is clear-cut, nor are any of the options it has identified free from wider consequences. For this reason I am anxious that the report should be made widely available for discussion and comment before I, together with my ministerial colleagues in Scotland and elsewhere, give further consideration to its findings. I am therefore publishing the report of the Interdepartmental Working Group on Blight, the draft Code of Practice and the draft Property Purchase Guarantee and Compensation Scheme. Comments from all those with an interest are invited by 31 March.

Ministry of Defence Properties

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish guidance to those concerned with the disposal and subsequent development of surplus Ministry of Defence properties. [21665]

Mr. Caborn: Together with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, I have today published guidelines on the joint working of Ministry of Defence and Regional Government Offices on the disposal of surplus MOD property. Copies have been placed in the Library.

The guidelines, which have been prepared with the close cooperation of the Government Offices in the Regions, MOD and my Department, are designed to help mitigate any adverse impact on a local community which may follow the closure of a defence establishment. We hope that, by putting in place arrangements for joint working between MOD and the Government Offices, and by bringing into discussions at an early stage local authorities and other agencies which may be involved in planning the future use of redundant sites, the full potential of these sits will be realised, consistent with the principles of sustainable development. It is hoped that these arrangements will also help speed up the disposal process. It should be noted, however, that these guidelines may, in due course, need to be revised to take account of research currently underway into the development of the redundant defence estate, and to reflect the establishment of the Regional Development Agencies. For this reason, they should be seen as interim.

The guidelines, which I am sending to local authorities, bodies responsible for urban and rural regeneration, Government Offices and other interested bodies, will be freely available to other with an interest.

Merchant Shipping (Donaldson Report)

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress the Government has made implementing the recommendations of Lord Donaldson's inquiry into the prevention of pollution from merchant shipping. [21668]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have today placed copies of a progress note in the Library. This shows that the bulk of the Inquiry's recommendations have now been implemented, that the implementation of the majority of the remainder is ongoing, that some have been overtaken, and that only five are still under consideration.

Fire Safety

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what changes he proposes to make to the building regulations in England and Wales to improve fire safety in buildings. [21092]

Mr. Raynsford: I am issuing today a consultation paper which sets out proposed changes to the Approved Document which is published in support of Part B of Schedule 1 to the Building Regulations 1991, covering fire safety matters.

The changes reflect experience of significant fires in buildings since the document was last revised as well as changes in construction practice. The text also reflects changes made to improve the clarity of the guidance in the light of queries received upon it.

Amongst the changes proposed are a requirement for sprinklers to be installed in large single storey retail premises, and restrictions on the use of certain thermoplastic cored products with good insulation properties used in food processing factories and elsewhere. Both of these proposals have been brought forward with the safety of firefighters in mind as well as building users.

Other changes include restrictions on the use of certain materials in lighting diffusers, and in respect of dwellings, additional guidance on the siting and installation of smoke alarms, including in loft conversions, and on the provision of suitable escape windows in habitable rooms.

I am placing a copy of the consultation paper in the Library, comments on these proposals have been invited by 31 March 1998.

WALES

GP Fundholders

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what have been the payments made to general practitioner fundholders in Wales in each year since 1990–91 in respect of (a) management allowances and (b) computer costs. [19940]

Mr. Win Griffiths: Reimbursement to general practitioner fundholders in respect of expenses covered by management allowances and associated computer costs since the inception of the scheme is as follows:

£ million

	Management costs	Computer costs
1990–91	0.112	—
1991–92	0.518	0.588
1992–93	1.677	0.997
1993–94	3.055	1.283
1995–96	6.707	1.268

Expenditure figures for 1996–97 are not available but provisional accounts suggest that the total sum amounts to £8.8 million for management allowance and £0.765 million for computers.

Nursery Education

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many four-year-olds were in (a) maintained reception classes, (b) maintained nursery classes or schools and (c) voluntary and private settings (i) on 23 September 1997 and (ii) in January 1996. [19939]

Mr. Hain: The information is not available in the form requested. The January 1997 School census showed 35,313 pupils aged 4 were receiving at least part-time education in maintained nursery, primary and special schools, of whom 1,017 were in nursery schools, 7,746 in nursery classes in primary schools and 136 in special schools. This compares with 35,251 at January 1996, of whom 1,044 were in nursery schools, 7,828 in nursery classes in primary schools and 131 in special schools. Nursery voucher redemption statistics indicate that 2,407 four-year-olds were receiving at least part-time nursery education in private and voluntary settings in the Summer term 1997.

Primary School Class Sizes

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what percentage and how many primary school pupils were in classes of over (a) 30, (b) 36 and (c) 40 in January (i) in each local education authority in Wales and (ii) in total; and what was the actual and percentage change in numbers relative to January 1996 in each case. [19942]

Mr. Hain: The annual January Schools Census has collected information about the number of classes by size of class but not the total number of pupils in each class. The following table shows for each local education authority area the percentages of ordinary classes in maintained primary schools in January 1996 and 1997 which had more than 30, 35 or 40 pupils.

Capital Expenditure (Swansea)

Mr. Donald Anderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas) of 1 December 1997, Official Report, columns 85-86, if he will make a statement on the level of publicly funded capital expenditure in the Swansea Council area in each of the past three years. [20007]

Mr. Win Griffiths: Not all this information is held centrally but the principal sums made available or committed over the past three years totalling £75.8 million were:

	£ million
European Regional Development Fund	5.0
Welsh Development Agency	11.7
Transport Grant/Supplementary Credit Approval	36.4
SportsLot	1.3
Welsh Arts Lottery Fund	1.4
Strategic Development Scheme	12.6
Wales Tourist Board	0.3
CADW	0.1
Heritage Lottery	0.6
Top Slice Housing Supplementary Credit Approval	6.4

These figures exclude sums made available through basic credit approvals, expenditure on further and higher education and more general housing provision.

Public Transport

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on liaison between the unitary authorities and the Welsh office on the preparation of plans for public transport. [20311]

Mr. Hain: Following my decision earlier this year to expand the scope of the Transport Grant Scheme to cover integrated transport packages, I expect local authorities' plans for public transport to feature increasingly in the regular discussions of Transport Grant issues which take place between authorities and the Welsh Office.

Teachers

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many full time teachers there were in (a) the primary and (b) the secondary sector in 1997; and what estimate he has made of the numbers in each case in 2000. [20099]

Mr. Hain: At January 1997 there were 11,859 qualified full time teachers in the maintained primary sector and 11,925 in the maintained secondary sector. By the school year 2000–01 the number of pupils in the primary sector is forecast to fall while numbers in the secondary sector are expected to rise. The extent to which teacher numbers reflect these changes will be determined by decisions made by local education authorities.

Students

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many students there were in further education in 1987; and what is the number for the last year for which figures are available. [20308]

Mr. Hain: The number of students on further education courses at further and higher education institutions for 1987–88 and 1996–97 are given in the following table:

Number of students on further education courses at further and higher education institutions in Wales

	1987–88 [1]	1996–97 [2]
Number of students	69,837	144,015

Sources:
Welsh Office (Further Education Student Record) and Further Education Funding Council for Wales (Individualised Student Record).
Notes:
[1] At 1 November. Excludes the number of students at the Workers Educational Association and Young Mens Christian Association.
[2] Provisional. At 1 December. Includes the number of students at the Workers Educational Association and Young Mens Christian Association.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (i) access and (ii) foundation course students are currently enrolled on courses in Wales which (a) are and (b) are not an integral part of a course of higher education. [20091]

Mr. Hain: For access courses, figures collected by the Welsh Funding Councils show that there were 1,804 full-time students and 1,123 part-time students (including some on very short courses) on access to higher education courses in further education sector colleges and external institutions in Wales in 1996–97. Access courses are classed as further education courses, although some are designed for entry to specific higher education courses.

Figures for foundation courses which are not parts of higher education courses are not available.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what proportion of students went on to higher education (i) within one year and (ii) within three years of having completed a foundation or access course in Wales in the last year for which figures are available; [20093]

(2) how many students currently enrolled on access and foundation courses in Wales applied for the course before 23 July; and if he will make a statement. [20092]

Mr. Hain: The information is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what means-tested NHS bursaries he proposes to make available for medical and dental students in their fifth and subsequent years. [20096]

Mr. Win Griffiths: This matter is still under consideration.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what is his estimate of the year on year revenue released from abolishing the assisted places scheme in (a) September 1998, (b) September 1999, (c) September 2000, (d) September 2001 and (e) September 2002; [20135]

(2) what is his estimate of the year on year cost of additional teachers as a consequence of abolishing the assisted places scheme in (a) 1998–99, (b) 1999–2000, (c) 2000–01, (d) 2001–02 and (e) 2002–03. [20134]

Mr. Hain: Estimated annual revenue savings in Wales accruing from the phasing-out of the Assisted Places Scheme, for the period 1998–2002, is shown in the following table.

Year	Revenue released (£)
1998–99	1,350,000
1999–00	2,150,000
2000–01	2,700,000
2001–02	3,200,000
2002–03	3,750,000
Total	13,150,000

The number of APS pupils in Wales returning to or needing to be accommodated in maintained schools will be small and we do not foresee the need for additional teachers. The likely numbers and associated cost of additional teachers in relation to the planned reduction of infant class sizes is not yet known. The Welsh Office will commence consultation with Directors of Education in January on delivering our class sizes pledge.

Farmers

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many full-time farmers there were in Wales in (a) 1985, (b) 1986, (c) 1987, (d) 1988, and (e) the latest year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [20309]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The information requested is shown as follows:

Number of full-time farmers, partners and directors in Wales[1]

	Thousands
1985	24.5
1986	24.4
1987	23.5
1988	23.8

Note:

[1] Figures are for those persons working on main and minor farm holdings on 1 June and exclude spouses of farmers, partners and directors, even though the wives/husbands themselves may be partners or directors.

Wind Farms

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many sites have been granted planning permission for wind farms; and if he will make a statement. [20330]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The information is not held centrally. Local planning authorities are primarily responsible for determining planning applications.

However, I understand that under the Non Fossil Fuel Obligation orders there are 13 operational wind farm sites in Wales and that a further 4 have planning permission.

Forest Enterprise

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many full-time employees the Forestry Commission had in 1987; what is the current complement of staff working for Forest Enterprise; and if he will make a statement. [20307]

Mr. Win Griffiths: In 1987 the Forestry Commission employed 867 staff in Wales. The Commission currently employs 425 staff in Wales, of whom 383 work for Forest Enterprise. These figures include part-time staff so that, for example, two staff who each work half a week have been counted as one.

Further Education

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what additional funds he plans to make available for further education in Wales in 1997–98; and if he will make a statement. [20094]

Mr. Hain: My right hon. Friend will shortly be considering additional funding for the further education sector in Wales in 1997–98.

Welsh Language (Patagonia)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when his Department introduced a scheme to fund the teaching of Welsh in Patagonia. [20126]

Mr. Hain: It was announced in August 1996 that the Welsh Office would contribute towards a joint project with the British Council to help strengthen the language and cultural links between Wales and Patagonia. The project, which was intended to be of three years' duration, subject to satisfactory progress in the first year, commenced in April 1997. My right hon. Friend has recently agreed to the continuation of the project into its second year.

Blue Flag Beaches

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many Blue Flag beaches there were in (a) 1995, (b) 1996 and (c) at the latest available date. [20313]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The information is as follows:

1995: 2

1996: 4

1997: 9.

Agricultural Employment

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were employed in agriculture in Wales in (a) 1986, (b) 1987 and (c) the most recent year for which figures are available. [20320]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The information requested is shown as follows:

Number of persons employed in agriculture[1]

	Thousands
1986	56.1
1987	53.8
1996	52.8

Source:

Note:
[1] Figures are for those persons working on main and minor farm holdings on 1 June and excludes spouses of farmers, partners and directors, even though the wives/husbands themselves may be partners or directors.

Acid Rain

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to deal with the effects of acid rain; and if he will make a statement. [20310]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The UK was one of the first countries to ratify the Second Sulphur Protocol under the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe (UNECE) Convention on Long Range Transboundary Air Pollution. This commits the UK to reducing emissions of sulphur dioxide by 80 per cent. by 2010 compared with 1980 levels. The Government are currently taking an active part in negotiations in the EU on a Strategy to further combat acid deposition. This was discussed on 16 December at a meeting of EU Environment Ministers.

Acid rain is an on-going transboundary issue and only by concerted action across Europe shall we deal effectively with the problem. The final report of the Welsh Acid Water Survey carried out in 1995–96 and commissioned by the Welsh Office and the Environment Agency was published on 26 November. The Survey indicates that although there are signs that the benefits of emission controls are being felt in the environment the recovery of sensitive ecosystems has been slow.

NHS Bureaucracy

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the sums saved in the NHS in Wales from reducing bureaucracy to date. [20728]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The suspension of the 8th wave of GP Fundholding released £1.9 million immediately.

Trusts and authorities are working towards recurrent savings of £1.8 million and £2.3 million respectively. Information on the realisation of these savings is not collected in year. Figures for the whole year will be available from the 1997–98 audited accounts, which will be available in August 1998.

NHS Contracts

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to change the system of annual contracts in the NHS; and if he will make a statement. [20732]

Mr. Win Griffiths: Guidance has already been issued to NHS Wales encouraging health authorities, trusts and GPs to enter into agreements which go beyond one year's duration.

A White Paper will be issued shortly which will provide more detailed proposals on the abolition of the internal market and on the mechanisms that will be introduced to replace it.

Nutrition

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has for improving nutritional standards. [20730]

Mr. Win Griffiths: Included in the targets my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has set NHS Wales is to work with others to increase by 2002 the proportion of people who eat green vegetables, salads and fresh fruit most days.

The Health Promotion Authority for Wales whose role is to promote good health and prevent ill-health is also working towards improving nutrition in Wales. Activities include the provision of information to assist people to attain a healthy weight for their height; an examination of nutritional policies and standards in NHS hospitals; the monitoring of dietary interventions projects in schools, such as healthy tuck shops; and surveys every two years of adults' and childrens' dietary intake to identify trends and to highlight needs for intervention.

In addition the Government intend that the Food Standards Agency, when constituted, will have an important role across the UK in providing advice on certain aspects of nutrition.

Hospital Waiting Times

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many patients have been waiting for treatment for more than 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [20729]

Mr. Win Griffiths: Latest published figures for Health Authorities show that at the end of September 1997, 90 per cent. of Welsh residents had waited less than 12 months for inpatient or day-case hospital treatment; 6,810 people (10 per cent. of those on the waiting list) had waited more than 12 months.

Telemedicine

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to encourage the use of telemedicine. [20731]

Mr. Win Griffiths: Wales has been at the forefront of developing telemedicine; an experimental project in North Powys showed the benefits to patients and practitioners from having electronic access to distant specialists. To take this work further, the Welsh Office is supporting the Ceredigion and Mid Wales NHS Trust in its "Keeping Care Local" project. This project will review the full range of trust services to find ways of using telemedicine technology to benefit much larger numbers of patients. The results will be published at a conference and exhibition on telemedicine in Cardiff on 27 and 28 April 1998. I expect health authorities and trusts to learn from such work and to exploit opportunities in their own areas.

SCOTLAND

Water and Sewerage Authorities

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will announce the external finance limits which will apply to the Scottish water and sewerage authorities in 1998–99 and in the following two years. [20741]

Mr. Macdonald: The External Finance Limit (EFL) for the three water authorities has been set at £185.956 million for 1998–99. Indicative EFLs for 1999–2000 and 2000–01 will be determined in the light of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

The allocation of EFLs to each authority in 1998–99 will be: East Authority £58.985 million, North Authority £55.582 million, and West Authority £71.389 million.

Council Tax

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will amend the law to remove students from joint and several liability for council tax payments. [20351]

Mr. Macdonald: We intend to amend the council tax liability rules to remove students from joint and several liability from council tax as soon as a suitable legislative opportunity arises.

Housing Association Rents

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total gross revenue from housing association rents in the last year; and what proportion of this was met by housing benefit. [20747]

Mr. Macdonald: The available information is as follows. In 1995–96, gross revenue from housing association rents in respect of housing associations registered in Scotland is estimated by Scottish Homes to have been £180 million. The Department of Social Security, which has responsibility for housing benefit, estimates that in the same year tenants of housing associations in Scotland—whether registered or not—received in total around £78 million of housing benefit.

Starter Pistols

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his Department's policy on the use of starter pistols; and what representations he has received from (a) the police and (b) representatives of athletic associations on this subject. [20800]

Mr. McLeish: The Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 contains an exemption which allows the possession of starting pistols by certain officials for use in the starting of athletics races. These pistols must be held on a firearm certificate which will be issued only where the police are satisfied that the individual requires the pistol because of the status of the athletics meetings at which he officiates. Most starting pistols can fire only blank rounds.

No representations have been received from the police on this issue. The British Athletic Federation sought the retention of the exemption when the Government announced their intention to ban small-calibre pistols. The Federation is currently funding research into an effective alternative to the starting pistol.

Marine Minerals

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the review of licensing arrangements for the dredging of marine minerals. [21620]

Mr. Macdonald: Currently the Crown Estate, as owners of the seabed, issue licences for minerals dredging. A prerequisite to the issue of a licence is a favourable "Government View" (GV) issued by the Scottish Office which co-ordinates and considers the views of Government Departments and responses to public consultation on the proposals before issuing a GV.

After consideration of all the responses to earlier consultation on the review of the GV procedure, we have concluded that the way forward is to introduce statutory procedures for the better regulation of marine minerals dredging in Scotland to replace the non-statutory GV procedure. The new arrangements would be based on the Secretary of State for Scotland being responsible for administering, monitoring and enforcing the new dredging consents; those consents being subject to regular review; the costs of administering the new statutory procedures being recovered from operators; and a statutory right of appeal against refusal. Although to date there has only been limited dredging activity in Scotland, pending legislation an interim scheme will be introduced and administered by the Scottish Office in place of the Crown Estate's current role in the GV process.

Environmental Protection Agency

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when the first annual report of the Scottish Environmental Protection Agency will be published. [21621]

Mr. Dewar: I laid a copy of SEPA's First Annual Report and Accounts before both Houses on 16 December. It contains details of the progress made by SEPA in its first year of operation, and a copy of its accounts, which cover the first 18 months of its existence. I am pleased to see that SEPA has made a good start and has done very well to pull together the very diverse bodies from which it was formed. I am also satisfied that SEPA is now on a firm financial footing and can move forward confidently to bring about the continuing improvement of Scotland's environment which we all wish to see.

Water Authorities

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will announce the new appointments to the three Scottish water authorities. [21666]

Mr. Dewar: I have made the following appointments to the three Scottish Water Authorities:

North of Scotland Water Authority

Councillor Colin Rennie, Councillor Joan Easten (re-appointment), Nigel Hawkins, Andrew Lewis (re-appointment), Nicolas McAndrew (re-appointment).

East of Scotland Water Authority

Councillor Robert Cairns, Robin Bell (re-appointment), David Bleiman, John Broadfoot, Councillor Jeanette Burness, Councillor Thomas Dair, Councillor Ann Dickson (re-appointment).

West of Scotland Water Authority

Norman Berry (re-appointment), Councillor Gerald Carroll, David Gray (re-appointment), Jane McKay, Councillor David Munn.

Industrial Tribunal Decisions

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what estimate he has made of the number of industrial tribunal decisions which are fully complied with within a period of two months from the tribunal decision; [21171]

(2) what plans he has to introduce procedures to allow for easier enforcement of industrial tribunal decisions; and if he will make a statement; [21173]

(3) what mechanisms are available to ensure the enforcement of industrial tribunal decisions. [21172]

Mr. Wilson: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given today by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney).

CABINET OFFICE

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if he will provide a list of the areas on which he is prepared to answer questions in respect of the Millennium Experience and a list of the areas on which he is not prepared to answer questions. [21327]

Mr. Mandelson: I aim to answer all questions on my responsibilities to the best of my ability.

Millennium Experience

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister without Portfolio, pursuant to his answer of 24 November 1997, Official Report, column 388, concerning his meeting with the French Minister for European Affairs on 16 September, if any civil servants were present at the meeting; and if he will list the subjects discussed. [21351]

Mr. Mandelson: We discussed the Jobs Summit and French ideas for "Euro-X". Civil Servants were present.

DEFENCE

Joint Fighter Project

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what contribution the Government are making to the United States joint fighter project; and when the aircraft is expected to enter service. [13860]

Mr. Spellar: The United Kingdom Government is contributing $200 million as a collaborative partner in the concept demonstration phase of the United States Joint Strike Fighter project. The aircraft is scheduled to enter service with the United States service in 2008. Procurement plans will, however, be considered as part of the Strategic Defence Review.

Defence Procurement Industry

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many defence procurement jobs there are in (a) England and (b) Wales; and if he will make a statement. [20331]

Mr. Spellar: I assume the hon. Member's question refers to jobs in the Procurement Executive (PE) of the Ministry of Defence. At 1 April 1997 there were 6,199 PE posts in England and one PE post in Wales. The single post in Wales was transferred to England at the end of August 1997.

Challenger 2 Tanks

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the (a) first and (b) last of the Challenger 2 tanks are expected to enter service; what is the current yearly delivery schedule; and what is the life expectancy of a single tank of the class. [20075]

Mr. Spellar: The first delivery of a production Challenger 2 main battle tank took place in August 1994. After reliability problems were confirmed in October 1995, no further tanks were accepted beyond the 36 already delivered. The successful completion of the Production Reliability Growth Trials in November 1997 means that deliveries of tanks are due to resume in January 1998 with the aim of completing deliveries to the first regiment in June 1998. Deliveries are planned to continue until February 2002. The current schedule of contract deliveries for the 386 tanks is as follows:

1996–97: 0

1997–98: 23

1998–99: 106

1999–00: 76

2000–01: 76

2001–02: 69.

The current planned in-service life of a Challenger 2 tank is 30 years.

Trawlers

Mr. Alan Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 2 December 1997, Official Report, column 171, concerning intelligence gathered by trawlers (a) how many trawlers were used and from which ports (b) when this practice eased and (c) what financial arrangements were made to recompense the officers and crew used in such activities. [20355]

Dr. Reid: Three trawlers were used for specific intelligence gathering operations against the former Soviet Navy in the mid 1960s and early 1970s. These operations ceased in 1973. All of the vessels were owned by a Hull based company and almost certainly operated from that port. For those operations conducted in the 1960s, the owner was guaranteed compensation for loss of catch resulting from any diversion from the trawler's usual fishing grounds. Available records do not indicate whether similar arrangement existed for those carried out in the 1970s.

Radiation Dose Records

Mr Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made to date on entering the pre-1979 personal radiation dose records onto an electronic database for ex-employees, at the Chatham Dockyard; when this is expected to be completed; and when and in what format the data are to be published. [20465]

Mr. Spellar: My Department has completed the process of scanning onto the Dosimetry Information Database all the available dosimetry documents from the former Dockyard at Chatham that are not part of an Approved Dosimetry Service. This includes all such records from before 1979. The database complements the approved Dosimetry Service records and will allow searches for all of the information relating to an individual to be carried out much more speedily than in the past.

The database contains personal data and it will not therefore be published.

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the people who have registered for the national counselling scheme in respect of exposure to radiation were informed that their adaption dose records could not be found; and, of these, how many were designated as (a) classified persons and (b) approved scheme workers under the approved dosimetry scheme that operated at their respective places of employment at the time of their employment. [20463]

Mr. Spellar: To date we have been unable to find radiation dose records for thirty four applicants to the national counselling scheme. Of these applicants none has been identified as a classified person and at least three were approved scheme workers.

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the individuals who have registered for the counselling scheme announced on 4 June, for whom no dose records could be found, were designated (a) classified persons and (b) approved scheme workers under the approved dosimetry scheme which operated at the Chatham Dockyard at the time of their employment. [20464]

Mr. Spellar: None of the individuals who have registered for the counselling scheme announced on 4 June and for whom no dose records can be found has been identified as a designated classified person. At least three were approved scheme workers.

Navy Officers

Mr. Alan Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 2 December 1997, Official Report, column 171, if he will make a statement on the scheme whereby Royal Navy officers gained sea-going experience in deep sea trawlers. [20354]

Dr. Reid: It has been long standing practice to send junior RN officers to sea on Merchant ships. In the 1950s this was extended to include deep sea trawlers. The aim was to provide sea going experience and to foster good relationships between the fleets. While the Royal Navy/Merchant Navy Voyage Scheme continues to this day, available records indicate that the use of trawlers ceased in the mid-1970s.

Fleet Maintenance

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the current allocated work loads from his Department for (a) Devonport, (b) Rosyth and (c) the Royal Navy's Fleet Maintenance and Repair Organisation. [20684]

Mr. Spellar: The MOD allocated workloads for each of Devonport, Rosyth and the Fleet Maintenance and Repair Organisation (FMRO), for the current year, 1997–98, are shown below. These figures are rounded to the nearest thousand and are based on MOD planning assumptions only. The actual workloads will depend on the outcome of contract negotiations.

	Manweeks
Devonport	76,000
Rosyth	77,000
FMRO	26,000

Service Personnel (Compensation)

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when his comprehensive review of the arrangements for compensating service personnel or their dependants and for the payment of death and invalidity pension benefits will (a) commence and (b) report to Ministers; when he expects to publish the results and the consultation document; if the review will consider the arrangements applicable to (i) civilian Ministry of Defence employees and (ii) private sector contractors' staff where death or injury was attributable to service supporting the uniformed military in training or on operations; and if he will make a statement. [21122]

Dr. Reid: The review of the arrangements for compensating Service personnel who suffer death or injury as a result of their military service which was announced on 8 December will commence in January. The aim will be to complete the review in time for the publication of a consultative document next Summer. The review will be limited to consideration of the compensation arrangements for Service personnel and their dependants.

Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the average annual cost of storing spent nuclear submarine nuclear fuel rods at the British Nuclear Fuels plant at Sellafield. [21216]

Dr. Reid: The average annual running cost of storing spent fuel from nuclear submarines at BNFL Sellafield is £1.4 million.

Nuclear Submarines

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the average annual costs of storing decommissioned nuclear powered submarines at Rosyth and Devonport. [21218]

Mr. Spellar: The average cost of storing the Royal Navy's fully decommissioned nuclear powered submarines at Rosyth and Devonport is £93,000 per vessel.

Naval Establishments

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the primary roles and functions of the Royal Navy establishment at Northwood. [21211]

Dr. Reid: The primary role and function of HMS Warrior, the Royal Navy establishment at Northwood, is to provide the support and infrastructure to the other units resident at the Northwood HQ. These other units are: The Commander in Chief Fleet, The Flag Officer Submarines; Headquarters 11/18 Group RAF; The UK Permanent Joint Headquarters and a major NATO headquarters.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the annual running costs of the Royal Navy establishment at Northwood. [21212]

Dr. Reid: The estimated running cost for HMS Warrior, the Royal Navy establishment at Northwood for 1997–98, including Service Pay, is some £17.5 million.

Royal Irish Regiment

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason figures are not available for the perceived religious and community origin of serving members of the Royal Irish Regiment General Service Batallion. [20323]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Under the terms of the Fair Employment (Northern Ireland) Acts 1976 and 1989, my Department is required to monitor the religious/community background of employees wholly or mainly employed in Northern Ireland. The General Service soldiers of the Royal Irish Regiment are not wholly or mainly employed in Northern Ireland and are not subject to the Act. There is therefore no requirement to monitor the religious/community background of this or any other General Service Battalion and the information requested is not monitored centrally in Northern Ireland. However, my Department estimate that the perceived religious/community origin of the General Service Battalion is broadly 70–75 per cent. Protestant and just over 20 per cent. Roman Catholic.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will approximate to district council constituencies the field of operations of each battalion of the Royal Irish Regiment Home Service. [20325]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 16 December 1997]: In broad terms, the information requested is set out below:

3rd Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment: Craigavon, Lisburn, Banbridge

4th Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment: Fermanagh

5th Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment: Magherafelt, Limavady, Coleraine, Moyle, Ballymoney

7th Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment: Belfast, North Down, Castlereagh

8th Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment: Armagh

9th Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment: Lisburn, Antrim.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in the last month for which figures are available how many Royal Irish Regiment patrols were (a) accompanied by the RUC and (b) unaccompanied. [20287]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The information requested for the period of 10 November to 8 December 1997 (inclusive) is set out as follows:

Battalion	Number of patrols accompanied by RUC	Number of patrols unaccompanied by RUC
3rd Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment	58	38
4th Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment	230	0
5th Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment	11	13
7th Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment	0	0
8th Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment	175	58
9th Battalion The Royal Irish Regiment	50	0

A patrol is defined as any foot or mobile patrol in support of the RUC, regardless of size or duration. Patrols conducted by the Army for local security around bases are not included.

West Indies Guardship

Mr. Faber: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 5 December 1997, Official Report, column 383, concerning the West Indies Guardship, where and when discussions took place with the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development; and if minutes were taken at the meeting. [21292]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development had informal discussions with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about this matter in the precincts of the House. The date of these discussions has not been recorded and no minutes were taken.

HEALTH

Drugs (Licensing)

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what criteria are applied to new drugs to assess their effectiveness before they receive a licence for general use. [17032]

Ms Jowell: The marketing authorisation (the licensing) of all medicines throughout the European Union is governed by the Rules Governing Medicinal Products in the European Union, in particular, Council Directive 65/65/EEC. Under these rules a licence application is refused if the medicinal product is harmful in the normal conditions of use, or if its therapeutic efficacy is lacking or is insufficiently substantiated, or if there are concerns about its qualitative and quantitative composition. In this context "therapeutic efficacy" and "clinical effectiveness" are judged to be synonymous.

Bone Marrow Donors

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he will take to encourage people from ethnic minorities to volunteer as bone marrow donors. [19170]

Mr. Boateng: Bone marrow donors are recruited through two organisations. The British Bone Marrow Register is funded through the national health service and recruits from blood donors at blood donation sessions. The Anthony Nolan Bone Marrow Trust is a charity funded by voluntary giving and recruits donors from the general public through local and national publicity campaigns. Both of these organisations, as well as some local campaigns, are working to encourage donation from ethnic minority groups.

The Anthony Nolan Trust has been particularly active in this field, both nationally and locally. It has produced leaflets and posters to encourage donations from the African-Caribbean community and has also worked to encourage people from the Greek and Turkish communities to come forward as donors. This year the Department funded through the Anthony Nolan Bone Marrow Trust a commercial to be included in Asian video films to appeal to the Asian community to donate blood and bone marrow.

There have also been local campaigns. In Birmingham, for example, transplant co-ordinators have produced a multi-ethnic poster to encourage donation generally (the poster features the organ donation card) by people from ethnic minority groups.

More generally, there are continuing campaigns to encourage positive attitudes towards tissue donation. During this year, the Department is promoting a wide range of measures designed to increase the number of regular blood donors through raising awareness of the need to maintain supplies of blood to hospitals. This includes the launch this year of a new 3 to 5 year publicity strategy, designed to increase the current donor base. As the British Bone Marrow Register recruits solely from those who are blood donors any success in increasing blood donation should also lead to increased numbers registering as potential bone marrow donors.

NHS Trust Hospitals

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current total of NHS trust hospitals. [19557]

Mr. Milburn: Prior to 1991 information was available centrally on the number of hospitals with residential facilities. Data ceased to be collected at unit level in 1991.

The number of national health service hospital trusts in England is 399, although a trust may consist of more than one hospital.

Dental Treatment (Deaths)

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list, by NHS Executive region, the total number of children who have died under general anaesthetic for dental treatment for each year since 1979. [20371]

Mr. Milburn: The data held centrally are not broken down by region. The table covers children under 15 to 1982 and under 16 thereafter.

Dental Services

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations his Department has received in response to the de-registering of patients who have not visited their dentist within the last 15 months; and if he will make a statement. [21322]

Mr. Milburn: From 1 September 1996, the registration period for both adult continuing care and child capitation was harmonised to provide patients with a period of continuing dental care for 15 months following each course of treatment. The aim of the changes was to improve value for money by focusing payments to dentists on those patients receiving active care from them.

Patients lapse from dentists' lists only if they have not seen their dentists since they registered. This is so, irrespective of the length of the registration period. Patients who attend their dentist at least every 15 months, have their registration period rolled forward automatically for another 15 months when they attend. They will notice no difference from the changes. Less regular attenders are still fully entitled to NHS dental treatment.

The changes to the registration periods were agreed with the British Dental Association (BDA) before they were implemented in September 1996. The BDA has recently changed its position, and has asked the Department to look again at the length of the registration periods.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he intends to take to encourage patients to register with their dentists before the Government regulations relating to patients who have not visited their dentist within the last 15 months are enforced. [21324]

Mr. Milburn: Patients who attend their dentist regularly will not be affected by the change in registration period. Less regular attenders are still fully entitled to National Health Service dental treatment, and are free to register at any time with a dentist willing to accept them.

Cannabis

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to publish his response to the conclusions of the BMA on the value of medicinal cannabis. [21047]

Ms Jowell: We have no plans to publish the reply sent to the British Medical Association (BMA). Department of Health officials will meet representatives of the BMA in the new year to discuss their report "The therapeutic uses of cannabis".

Tobacco

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will prevent the sale of tobacco products by anyone younger than the minimum age at which those products may legally be purchased. [20410]

Ms Jowell: The Government currently have no plans to do so.

Mentally Handicapped People

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the terms of reference are for the evaluation being conducted for his Department of residential and village community provision for people with a mental handicap; who is conducting the study; how much it will cost if the work was put out to tender; and when the main findings are expected. [20411]

Mr. Boateng: The evaluation consists of two phases. The first phase was in two parts. First, a review of literature on residential provision for people with learning disabilities. The terms of reference were

"to assess the state of knowledge about effectiveness and cost-effectiveness of different forms of residential accommodation for people with learning disabilities".

Secondly, an analysis of available information on the costs of village communities. The terms of reference were "to analyse and compare any information which is readily available on the financial costs of village communities and other forms of residential provision for people with learning disabilities".

Professor Eric Emerson of Hester Adrian Research Centre, University of Manchester, successfully competed for the contract for the first phase of the research which cost £26,471. The results of the first phase were published in July 1996 and distributed to social services departments and chief executives of health authorities.

The second phase consists of two related parts. The first will look at a sample of 300 people with learning disabilities living in residential or village communities, and 300 people with learning disabilities living in small scale community-based residential services. In the second part, more detailed information will be collected on two smaller matched sub-samples of people with profound multiple learning disabilities living in residential or village communities, and small scale community-based residential services.

Analyses of the data will focus upon: (1) describing and comparing the characteristics of the people served, the types of services received, the costs of services received and the outcomes associated with the two approaches to residential provision; and (2) examining the inter-relationships between the characteristics of the people served, the types of services received, the costs of services received and the resulting outcomes within and across the two types of provision.

To avoid any undue delay in the start of the second phase of the research, and because he successfully completed the first phase, Professor Eric Emerson of the Hester Adrian Research Centre, University of Manchester, was approached on a single tender basis to take the second phase forward. Professor Martin Knapp of the Personal Social Services Research Unit at the London School of Economics is undertaking the economic aspects of the research.

The study was commissioned in December 1996 at a cost to the Department of £274,464. Main findings from the study are expected in December 1998.

HIV/AIDS

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are his plans to increase the efficacy of HIV/AIDS educational initiatives to young people. [20717]

Ms Jowell: The Department of Health has a contract with the Health Education Authority to undertake HIV/AIDS health promotion work for the general population. Most of these initiatives are currently aimed at 16 to 24-year-olds and provide information about HIV/AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases and how to avoid them. The Government are committed to ensuring that such work is effective, evidence-based and properly evaluated through the use of research and pre-testing.

Ministers have recently announced the establishment of a Task Group which will look at Sex and Relationships Education. It will support the continued development of sex and relationships education in schools and youth settings. The Department for Education and Employment will be fully involved.

NHS Trusts (East Sussex)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the (a) advantages and (b) disadvantages of merging NHS trusts serving East Sussex; and if he will make a statement. [21354]

Mr. Milburn: No proposals for the merger of National Health Service trusts within East Sussex have been received. Mergers arising from local decisions will be considered on their merits, on the basis of demonstrable benefits in health and healthcare, and savings in administration.

Long-stay Facilities

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 15 July 1997, Official Report, columns 162-63, on long-stay facilities, if he will provide the same information for each year since 1989. [13056]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 5 November 1997]: The average daily number of available beds in the three main service areas where long stay provision is concentrated are set out in the tables.

I regret that the information provided in my reply of 15 July 1997 at columns 162-63 was incorrect. The figure in the table for 1993–94 under the heading Learning Disability reads 17,000. The correct figure is 16,000 as shown in the table. The figure for 1994–95 reads 14,000. This too is incorrect and should read 13,000.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Surplus Food Scheme

Ms Stuart: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if it is the Government's intention to participate in the EU Surplus Food Scheme in 1998; and if he will make a statement. [21658]

Mr. Rooker: Yes. The European Commission has allocated the United Kingdom some £20.3 million to operate the Scheme during 1998. Approximately 10 million cans of stewed steak will be made available to local authorities and to charitable and other non-profit making organisations to distribute to those on Income Support, Family Credit, Jobseekers Allowance (income based only) or Disability Working Allowance, the homeless and destitute and those living in welfare hostels.

The Scheme will involve only UK intervention beef which contains no offal and will be from animals killed when they were under thirty months of age and is no different from the meat currently available in the shops.

I am pleased that this surplus beef is to be put to good use.

Animal Feed

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice he has received from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee on the practice of feeding animal products to animals of the same species; and if he will make a statement. [21657]

Dr. John Cunningham: At my request, at its meeting on 2 December the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee considered the practice of feeding animal by-products to animals of the same species. The committee's advice is being published in full, and a copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

The committee did not consider that there was an immediate risk from intraspecies feeding. However, they thought it possible that TSEs might arise spontaneously in any species with a prion protein gene, and that if this were the case the practice of recycling waste as feed within a species could spread any resultant disease. The committee describes the risk here as small, but considered that it could not be discounted completely.

The committee has recommended that the Government develop a strategy to remove this risk, taking account of practical enforcement considerations and alternative disposal option, and discuss it with EC partners. Although the risk is small, I intend to accept this recommendation on a precautionary basis.

Essentially this means that the current practices of processing certain types of waste containing porcine material and feeding it as swill to pigs, and using poultry and feather meal as high protein ration for poultry, will have to end. Before legislating, however, I shall, as advised, consider the alternative routes for disposing of such waste. I am currently conducting a review of national animal waste legislation and intend to issue proposed legislation for consultation early in the New Year. That will set out our proposals in respect of pig swill subject to any further discussions in the European Community. I shall use that opportunity to ask for comments on the other issue raised by SEAC's advice. Subject to those comments, I also envisage bringing forward legislation to ban the recycling of poultry meals as poultry feed, but want to sound out Community partners first.

This action to avoid any possibility that a risk which the committee described as "small" and "potential" means that consumers will continue to enjoy the highest possible protection against the risks from TSEs, and give the assurance that pig and poultry products remain TSE free.

Mussel Seed Licences

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will continue to make available licences to take mussel seed stock for the purpose of ongrowing; and if he will make a statement. [21663]

Mr. Morley: This year licences have been made available on request to registered shellfish farmers in England and Wales to enable them to collect wild mussel seed for cultivation on registered shellfish farms. We shall continue to make such licences available and will be discussing the detailed arrangements with the shellfish industry and with other interests. Vessels licensed in this way will not count against the United Kingdom's objectives under the EU's Multi-Annual Guidance Programme.

British Cattle Movement Service

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a further statement on progress on setting up the British Cattle Movement Service at Workington. [21661]

Mr. Rooker: I am glad to report that refurbishment work has been completed at three out of the four buildings at the British Cattle Movement Service site at Workington. One building was handed over to MAFF in November, and a further two are being completed and handed over today. Work is now underway to equip these buildings ready for occupation. The fourth building will be handed over next year.

I am also pleased to announce that we have appointed a Director of the British Cattle Movement Service following an open competition. He is David Evans, currently Assistant Regional Director at the MAFF Regional Service Centre at Carlisle.

These developments are milestones in the important task of setting up the British Cattle Movement Service, which will run the new computerised cattle tracing system for Great Britain.

Fisheries (Quota Hopping)

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures his Department is taking in respect of the purchase of quota-hopping fishing vessels or their licences. [20261]

Mr. Morley: Under EC law, Ministers cannot discriminate against nationals from other Member States who are entitled to purchase British registered fishing vessels and to acquire the licence entitlements arising from such vessels.

Any qualifying UK registered vessel can apply to decommissioning schemes.

Animal Welfare and Specified Risk Materials

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the (a) welfare and (b) specified risk materials regulations in other EU countries relative to those obtaining in the United Kingdom. [20248]

Mr. Morley: (a) On animal welfare, the Member States of the European Union are obliged to give effect to the various requirements of EU law in relation to animal welfare on farm, in transit, at market and at slaughter, as well as to the provisions of the related Council of Europe Conventions.

(b) Controls on specified material from cattle, similar to those which exist in the UK, are carried out in France, Ireland, the Netherlands and Portugal. France, the Netherlands and Spain have controls on specified material from sheep and goats.

Fishing Vessels

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he proposes to make changes to the arrangements for the licensing of United Kingdom registered fishing vessels when implementing the United Kingdom's latest multi-annual guidance programme (MAGP IV); and if he will make a statement. [21659]

Mr. Morley: The existing arrangements for the licensing of fishing vessels will continue to operate subject to certain changes which are set out below.

Segmentation of the Fleet

The UK's multi annual guidance programme will set for each segment of our fishing fleet objectives to be met by 31 December 2001. There will be eight segments as follows:

pelagic trawls and purse seines

beam trawls

demersal and nephrop trawls and seines lines and nets

shell-fish mobile gear

shell-fish fixed gear

distant waters subdivided according to whether the vessels are exclusively or predominately active in non EU waters.

small scale coastal vessels under 10 metres.

The means by which these objectives are achieved will vary from segment to segment. They may involve restrictions and/or reductions in fishing effort or capacity or a combination of both.

From 1 January 1998, each fishing vessel will be assigned to a single segment, based on the principal activity recorded as being undertaken in 1996. Vessels which are new to the fleet or those which recorded no fishing activity in 1996 have been assigned to segments on the basis of earlier recorded activity or on the basis of other information available to Departments. The allocation of vessels to segments will be reviewed during 1998 to take account of fishing activity up to and including 1997. Departments will take into account information provided by owners where:

(i) the segmentation has been based on no recorded fishing activity;

(ii) a vessel is new to the fleet;

(iii) a vessel has engaged in a licence transaction as a result of which its fishing opportunities have materially changed.

Such information must be provided by 31 March 1998.

Once a fishing vessel has been assigned to a particular segment its capacity and fishing activity will continue to be recorded against that segment until further notice. Vessel owners will however be free to change the pattern of their fishing effort within any segment subject to any limitations posed by their fishing vessel licences.

Restrictions on Fishing for Pelagic Species

From 1 April 1998 UK registered fishing vessels eligible to fish for more than 500 tonnes of pelagic species—herring, mackerel, horse mackerel, pilchards, sprats and blue whiting—will be restricted to existing vessels in the fleet which on 17 December 1997: (a) held an existing category A pelagic (purse seine or freezer trawler) licence; or (b) held an existing category A licence and caught at least 500 tonnes of pelagic species in any of the four years 1994, 1995, 1996 and 1997.

Eligible vessels other than purse seiners and freezer trawlers will have their existing licences replaced by a new category A pelagic (trawler) licence. Any vessel which already holds a beam trawler licence will be permitted to continue to fish by that method.

Vessels holding category A pelagic (purse seine or freezer trawler) licences or category A pelagic (trawler) licences will also be able to fish for demersal species and pelagic species other than herring, mackerel, horse mackerel, pilchards, sprats and blue whiting, subject to complying with any licence or other restrictions in force or that may be imposed.

Any person who would not qualify for a category A pelagic (trawler) licence under the criteria outlined above but who considers that they should be issued with such a licence must advise the Fisheries Departments by 31 January 1998. Such applicants must: (a) have introduced a registered and licensed vessel into the UK fleet during 1997 with the intention of catching more than 500 tonnes of herring, mackerel, horse mackerel, sprats, pilchards or blue whiting; or (b) have entered into an enforceable financial commitment on or before 17 December 1997 to introduce a fishing vessel intended to catch more than 500 tonnes of herring, mackerel, horse mackerel, sprats, pilchards or blue whiting.

Documentary evidence of such an intention or enforceable financial commitment must also be presented to the Fisheries Departments by 31 January 1998.

Ring Fencing of Pelagic Licences

From 1 April 1998 vessels holding a category A pelagic (purse seine or freezer trawler) licence or a category A pelagic (trawler) licence will be ring fenced. Anyone wishing to introduce a new vessel into the pelagic fleet or to modify an existing pelagic vessel may only do so by acquiring an entitlement to a pelagic (purse seine or freezer trawler) licence or to a pelagic (trawler) licence. Within the ring fence it will not be possible to undertake a single licence transfer which involves the placement of a pelagic (trawler) licence on a pelagic freezer trawler or purse seiner.

Existing capacity penalties—10 per cent. for licence transfers and 20 per cent. for licence aggregations—will continue to apply to all licence transactions within the pelagic ring fence, as will existing restrictions on engine power and tonnage. However from 1 April 1998 the replacement or modification of purse seiners or pelagic freezer trawlers will be subject to a zero capacity penalty where single licence transfers occur or to a 10 per cent. capacity penalty where the aggregation of licences occurs, Any freezer trawler must be capable of processing at least 30 tonnes of pelagic species per day.

As from today it will no longer be possible to aggregate white fish licences with pelagic (purse seine or freezer trawler) licences to undertake minor engine modifications. The provision to park licences on purse seiners or freezer trawlers for up to two years pending their replacement or modification will also be terminated from this date.

As at present there will be no restrictions on category A pelagic licences being downgraded to ordinary category A white fish licences.

The Recording of Engine Power on Fishing Vessel Licences

For all licence transactions which will take place from 1 January 1999 the Fisheries Departments propose that the engine power to be recorded on the fishing vessel licence shall be the maximum continuous engine power that is capable of being generated by the vessel's engine. It is further proposed that this provision be extended on 1 January 2000 to all vessels licensed before 31 December 1998. Where fishing vessels engines have been permanently derated, the derated engine power will be treated as the maximum continuous engine power.

In parallel with the arrangements set out in the previous paragraph the Fisheries Departments will be undertaking random checks to ensure that the maximum continuous engine power of fishing vessels is not greater than that which is stated on the fishing vessel licence.

Review of the Licensing Arrangements

The present system of licensing has evolved over a long period following the agreement of the Common Fisheries Policy in 1982. It is the mechanism through which the Fisheries Departments seek to regulate both fishing activity and the size and structure of the UK fleet. Over the years the system has become highly complex in terms of the number of different licences that are issued, the conditions which are attached to the licences, the arrangements for transferring and aggregating licences, and the operation of capacity penalties and tonnage and engine power constraints which together exert downward pressure on the size of the UK fleet. Although a number of changes to the licensing arrangements have been announced today, I believe that it would be beneficial to undertake a more detailed review of the operation of the arrangements to establish whether they are necessary and if so how they may be improved. In undertaking such a review it is important to take account of the knowledge and expertise that lies within the fishing industry. To this end I propose that a series of meetings should be held with representatives of the principal fishermen's organisations and that a report on the conclusions reached be presented to Ministers. This forum will also be invited to consider what arrangements might be made to accommodate the recording of maximum continuous engine power on fishing vessel licences.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the scientists who sit on SEAC indicating other organisations for which they work. [20362]

Mr. Rooker: The table lists the current members of SEAC and the organisations for which they work.

I also refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to our hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Ms Morgan) on 24 July 1997, Official Report, column 710, which declared SEAC members' commercial and non-commercial interests.

Farming (New Entrants)

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures his Department is taking to encourage young people to enter the farming profession with particular reference to hill farming. [20370]

Mr. Morley: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to our hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) on 19 November 1997, Official Report, column 230.

In addition, Regulations laid on 3 December 1997 will help new entrants to sheep and suckler cow farming to obtain quota from the national reserve.

Belgian Cattle (BSE)

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if BSE has been detected in Belgian cattle destined for the United Kingdom pet food market. [20363]

Mr. Rooker: One case of BSE has been reported in Belgium. The carcase of the affected animal was rendered, and we understand that the resulting meat and bone was exported to the Netherlands and Poland. We have no reason to believe that any part of the affected animal was imported into the UK for use in pet food.

Over Thirty Months Scheme

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what compensation is available to the owner of a three-year-old heifer which is barren but cannot be sold into the food chain under the Over Thirty Months Scheme. [20369]

Mr. Rooker: The compensation available for animals entering the Over Thirty Months Scheme is determined by weight up to a maximum weight limit of 560 kg (liveweight). The maximum compensation available for steers and heifers at current exchange rates is £350.67.

Meat (Growth Hormones)

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the testing procedure used to ensure that no meat containing artificially added growth hormone is imported into the United Kingdom. [20368]

Mr. Rooker: The import from third countries of meat and meat products derived from animals treated with hormonal growth promoters has been banned since 1988, as has the use of these substances within the European community. Member states are responsible for implementing and policing the Community ban in respect of their own national production. Veterinary experts from the Commission may make on-the-spot checks to ensure the relevant Directives are being uniformly applied in all Member States.

Any third country wishing to export fresh meat to the European Union must submit residue sample plans to the Commission. These describe the residue sampling programme to be undertaken in respect of their meat production and must provide guarantees which are at least equivalent to the requirements of the Community on EC producers in respect of the banned substances.

Any third country which permits the use of growth promoting hormones is required to guarantee that no animal and no meat coming from animals to which they have been administered will be exported to the Community. Imports must be certified accordingly and Commission inspectors verify compliance with all the requirements when they carry out periodic checks on third country slaughterhouses authorised to produce meat for export to the Community.

Port Health Authorities (or local authorities in their absence) are responsible under Directive 90/675/EEC for checking 1 per cent. of all imported meat and meat products for residues of veterinary medicines and for banned substances.

Beef Heifers

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reasons there are no proposals in the CAP Agenda 2000 to pay premium on heifers bred for beef. [21199]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The Commission's proposals for the reform of the CAP regime for beef build on existing measures for that sector. These have traditionally focused on male animals (through intervention and the Beef Special Premium) and on suckler cows. The Commission believes that, in providing additional support for suckler cows and with the introduction of a premium on dairy cows, it is proposing some support for heifer calves reared for beef.

Quarantine

Mr. Gale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will state the procedures and criteria applied by his officials when dealing with the release of puppies and kittens born in quarantine; and if he will make a statement. [21166]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Puppies and kittens born to the quarantined mother are subject to 15 days' quarantine after separation from the mother providing she is still healthy at the time the puppies or kittens are released. The risk to puppies or kittens born to a quarantined mother is believed to be restricted to transmission of infected saliva after birth. Transmission of the rabies virus in utero is unknown, according to the scientific literature. As the rabies virus is present in the saliva for less than two weeks before clinical signs appear there is no risk to offspring if the mother is clinically healthy a fortnight after separation from the litter.

Agrimonetary Compensation Scheme

Mr. Gale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he intends to submit an application to the European Union on behalf of the United Kingdom for assistance under the agrimonetary compensation scheme. [21163]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 16 December 1997]: We are considering what further action might be necessary to alleviate the position of farmers affected by currency movements and other developments affecting income.

Offering new funds to farmers, even with reimbursement from the EU budget, carries very significant implications for UK public expenditure.

Beef on the Bone

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what organisations he has consulted in connection with the proposed ban on the sale of bone-in beef. [21197]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The Department consulted over 330 organisations representing consumer, industry and farming interests. The names of the organisations concerned are included in the consultation package on the proposed legislation prohibiting the sale of bone-in beef, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what criteria he will use to judge when the ban on the sale of beef on the bone products should be lifted in the United Kingdom. [20502]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 15 December 1997]: Our priority remains consumer safety. The ban will be kept under review and any decision to lift it will be taken in the light of scientific developments and progress with the eradication of BSE.

Bovine Bones

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which enforcement agencies will have responsibility for bovine bones in (a) butchers' shops, (b) cutting plants and (c) abattoirs. [21097]

Mr. Rooker: Enforcement of the new controls on bovine bones in Great Britain will be carried out as part of normal supervision and inspection of food premises, by either the Meat Hygiene Service in licensed cutting premises and abattoirs or local authorities in all other food premises.

Live Cattle (Export)

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will stop the payment of export refunds on the export of live cattle to third countries; and if he will make a statement. [20891]

Mr. Rooker: The United Kingdom does not pay export refunds on live cattle, because it is not currently allowed to export them. Any agreement to abolish export refunds on live cattle would have to be reached at Community level. Such agreement is unlikely. Nevertheless, thanks in large measure to UK pressure, the Agriculture Council has this week adopted a Commission proposal which will make the granting of refunds on live cattle subject to compliance with Community legislation on animal welfare and, in particular, the protection of animals during transport.

Rural Advisory Committee

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reasons he appointed each of the non-farming members of the Rural Advisory Committee; and if he will make a statement. [20103]

Mr. Rooker: All members of the Agricultural Advisory Group were chosen for the personal expertise and experience they could bring to bear on the subjects the Group would be asked to consider.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Non-departmental Public Bodies

11. Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what measures he is taking to broaden the social background from which appointments to non-departmental public bodies are made. [19611]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The Government are committed to attracting a broad range of applicants for public appointments—by the use of advertising and by encouraging members of under-represented groups to nominate themselves for the central and departmental lists of candidates.

12. Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received about his proposals to make quangos more open and accountable. [19613]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Following the publication of the Government's consultation paper "Opening up Quangos" we have received a number of comments from a wide range of organisations and from individuals. Most of these welcome the proposals in the consultation paper and offer additional suggestions to make quangos more open and accountable.

15. Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on progress in reducing the number of quangos. [19618]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Ministers are taking a careful look to see which quangos are really necessary, with a view to keeping the numbers to a minimum. Ministers are also undertaking a zero-based analysis of the functions of the NDPBs they sponsor as part of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

25. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to make non-departmental bodies more accountable to Parliament; and if he will make a statement. [19628]

Dr. David Clark: In our consultation paper "Opening up Quangos", published on 11 November, we set out ways of improving the accountability of quangos. I am inviting Select Committees to have greater oversight of quangos, by looking at annual reports and by being involved in the regular five-yearly reviews of quangos.

Freedom of Information

13. Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the principal objectives of the Government's proposals on freedom of information. [19614]

Dr. David Clark: The objective of our proposals on freedom of information are to encourage more open and accountable government by establishing a general statutory right of access to official records and information.

21. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Defence on his proposed freedom of information legislation. [19624]

Dr. David Clark: My right hon. Friend is a member of the Cabinet Committee which discussed extensively the proposals for freedom of information legislation now set out in our White Paper "Your Right to Know".

26. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement regarding the release of Government papers. [19629]

Dr. David Clark: The White Paper on Freedom of Information, "Your Right to Know", contains proposals for a Freedom of Information Act which would incorporate access rights to both current and historic records. For the present, Government records will continue to be released in accordance with the Public Records Acts 1958 and 1967.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to promote the Government's policy on freedom of information. [19615]

Dr. David Clark: I look forwared to a wide-ranging public debate on the proposals set out last week in the White Paper "Your Right to Know". As well as publishing the White Paper in print and on the internet, 40,000 copies of a leaflet explaining the main proposals are being distributed. The leaflet will also be available in seven minority languages, in large print, in Braille and on audio cassette.

Food Standards Agency

14. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects to publish his proposals for a food safety standards agency; and if he will make a statement. [19617]

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he plans to publish his White Paper on food safety; and if he will make a statement. [19623]

Mr. David Clark: The Government will be announcing their proposals when Parliament returns in the new year.

16. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received on his proposals for the establishment of a food safety standards agency. [19619]

22. Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received recently concerning food safety; and if he will make a statement. [19625]

Dr. David Clark: I refer the hon. Lady and my hon. Friend to the oral answer I gave to the hon. Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant).

Special Advisers

17. Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will review the operation of the new model contract for special advisers. [19620]

Dr. David Clark: The new model contract for special advisers was promulgated by the Prime Minister on 19 May 1997. It is kept under review, and will be amended as and when a need is identified.

24. Mr. Robathan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received on the role of special advisers with responsibilities for Government information. [19627]

Dr. David Clark: As I have made clear in response to questions from hon. Members, this Government have set out clearly in the model contract for special advisers the terms and conditions under which special advisers are employed. We have also published the report of the Review of the Government Information Service which clarifies the role of those special advisers with responsibility for media-related matters. Copies of both documents are in the Library.

Public Information (Broadcasting)

18. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what instructions are issued to the Central Office of Information on the broadcasting of public information announcements on television. [19621]

Mr. Kilfoyle: There are no instructions issued to the Central Office of Information on the broadcasting of public information announcements on television.

Better Government Programme

19. Mr. Ivan Lewis: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to involve local government in the better government programme. [19622]

Mr. David Clark: Local government are key partners in the Better Government programme.

As part of the Deputy Prime Minister's initiative to develop the partnership between Central and Local Government, I have set up a Working Group on Public Service Delivery, which includes representatives from the Local Government Association. The aim of the Group is to develop a framework for innovative pilots to improve services at the local level through different organisations working together.

Service Delivery (Technology)

23. Mrs. Ann Campbell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on his plans to promote public services via electronic networks. [19626]

Dr. David Clark: The Government intend to publish next year a White Paper on "Better Government", which will set out the way in which access to government services will be transformed using modern technology.

On 9 December I formally launched direct.link, an electronic forum which aims to bring together public sector organisations and voluntary agencies which are actively engaged in projects to provide electronic services to the citizen.

Direct.link is managed by the Central IT Unit (CITU) and it will conduct most of its business electronically, using discussion groups and e-mail. Direct.link will enable members to exchange ideas, share experiences and investigate topics of common interest.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. John Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps he is taking to ensure that Government Departments resolve the millennium computer compliance problem. [19605]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster made to the House on 27 November 1997, Official Report, columns 1104–05.

Citizens Charter

Ms Ward: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to reform the programme of charters. [19616]

Mr. Kilfoyle: We announced to the House on 2 July 1997, Official Report, columns 284–87, the Government's intention to relaunch the citizens charter. A consultation exercise to find out what people want from the programme ended on 21 November. We have received responses from a wide variety of sources, including consumer representative organisations; professional institutions; hospitals; local authorities; academics; and individual members of the public.

These responses will help shape the new programme, details of which will be published early next year as part of the Better Government initiative.

E-mail

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to the answer from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on 10 November 1997, Official Report, column 441, if he will list the e-mail addresses of (a) Ministers, (b) senior officials and (c) chief executives of agencies for which he is responsible. [15868]

Mr. Field [holding answer 13 November 1997]: Preparatory work is required to confirm that all security concerns have been addressed and that listed Ministers, Senior Officials and Agency Chief executives have systems/procedures in place to handle external E-Mail traffic.

Lone Parents

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to her answer of 27 November 1997, Official Report, column 664, for how many of the 433 lone parents referred to in Table 1 of her Department's publication "A New Deal for Lone Parents: Moving Forward-Progress Report on the First Three Months" reported as having obtained work she has information in the form set out in Table 2 of that report; and if she will publish such information as she has in that form. [18886]

Mr. Keith Bradley [holding answer 3 December 1997]: Information on the age, number of children, wage, previous duration on benefit, type of work and area is available for 409 of the 864 lone parents who have moved into work under the New Deal for Lone Parents up to the end of November. This information has been placed in the Library.

The Government do not routinely collect data on in-work costs for lone parents moving into work under the New Deal. This information will instead be assessed during the separate research commissioned for the New Deal. The research data will be released when the research is complete.

The eight estimates of financial gain from moving into work provided in the report "Moving Forward" were provided to illustrate the effects on individuals before in-work costs. These data are not, though, sufficiently robust for analysis of the impact of the New Deal.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment she has made, and on the basis of what sources of information, of the difference in incomes between lone parents on income support and those in work (a) before and (b) after child care costs are taken into account. [19703]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Estimates by the independent Policy Studies Institute indicate that the weekly income for lone parents already in work and receiving Family Credit is likely to be, on average, over £50 more than their estimated income on Income Support.

This estimate is based on a 1994 sample of lone parents in work, adjusted by the Policy Studies Institute to take account of two subsequent policy changes (the introduction of the childcare disregard in all in-work benefits in October 1994 and the introduction of a 30 hour credit in Family Credit in July 1995) and the annual uprating of benefit levels. It does not take account of changes announced in June 1997 to extend the child care disregard further.

The £50 per week estimate is before in-work costs which, excluding child care costs, averaged £5 per week; 79 per cent. were not paying for child care.

Some 21 per cent. of the sample were paying for child care. After allowing for in-work costs, including the costs of child care, this group is on average over £18 per week better off in work than on Income Support. These figures are, however, based on a small sample and should be treated with caution.

Direct comparisons between out of work income and in-work income for those lone parents currently receiving Income Support are difficult. It is not straightforward to predict the earnings of those lone parents who move into work since this would depend on the type of job they might get, and for how many hours. In addition, it is not possible to predict what child care costs they might have.

In order to ensure that more lone parents are better off financially in work, the Government will implement a National Minimum Wage and National Child Care Strategy, reforming the tax and benefit systems, and provide extra help with the cost of child care and access to lifetime learning.

It is important to recognise, though, that the financial return from working is not the only consideration which lone parents make in deciding to work. Qualitative research indicates that some lone parents choose to work in part to provide a role model for their children, and to take them away from dependency on benefit.

The New Deal for Lone Parents will provide practical help and advice for the lone parents on Income Support who want to move into work. As part of the New Deal service, lone parents who have been offered work, and have been advised of their earnings, can ask their Personal Adviser for an estimate of their likely entitlement to Family Credit and other in-work benefits. The evaluation of the programme includes a quantitative survey of a sample of participants in all eight areas of the scheme which will collect systematic information from lone parents on how much actually better off they are in work.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average income of a lone parent on (i) family credit and (ii) income support (a) in rented accommodation and (b) with a mortgage. [20548]

Mr. Keith Bradley [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The information is set out in the table.

£ per week

	Before housing costs		After housing costs
	Mean	Median	Mean	Median
Families on family credit in rented accommodation	197	198	155	155
Families on family credit with a mortgage	202	204	171	167
Families on income support in rented accommodation	184	166	135	116
Families on income support with a mortgage	177	166	127	112

Households Below Average Income (HBAI).

Notes:

1. Figures are for 1995–96.

2. The data come from the Department's Households Below Average Income (HBAI) series, based on the Family Resources Survey (FRS) and covering Great Britain. The FRS data were used to achieve a large enough sample size to provide more robust information. All results are subject to sampling error.

3. Both mean and median figures are given. This is because mean results may be affected by atypical households skewing the results.

4. The income measure used is weekly net (disposable) equivalised household income. The definition of income used follows that in the published HBAI series for FRS based results and therefore takes no account of child care costs; figures are given both before and after housing costs in line with usual HBAI practice. Families are counted as "with a mortgage" if the household they live in has a mortgage.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the Child Support Agency is permitted to make inquiries of the Inland Revenue in respect of the financial income in cases involving absent parents. [20079]

Mr. Field: The Child Support Agency can obtain the address of the absent parent and details of his employer from the Inland Revenue for tracing purposes. However, under current legislation, financial details cannot be obtained. We are determined to ensure that the Child Support Agency provides an efficient and effective service and are looking at all aspects of its work to see where improvements can be made. We aim to bring forward proposals in the first half of next year.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many absent parents are currently paying the minimum amount of child maintenance, as stipulated by the CSA, whilst they are receiving statutory (a) sick pay and (b) incapacity benefit. [20120]

Mr. Field: Absent parents receiving Statutory Sick Pay or Incapacity Benefit who are assessed to pay the minimum amount or less are exempt from payment.

Data from August 1997 show a small number of these cases with an assessment for the minimum amount. These will be cases where the absent parent has only recently started to receive statutory sick pay or incapacity benefit but the assessment has not yet been revised, and cases where payment of those benefits has ceased but the records have not yet been fully updated.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement on the guidance given to the Benefits Agency in assessing the capacity for work for persons suffering from ME and similar diseases. [20140]

Mr. Field: Detailed guidance on the approach to assessing people with Chronic Fatigue Syndrome (commonly referred to as ME) and similar conditions where variability of severity of symptoms is a feature, is provided in the Incapacity Benefit Handbook issued to all Benefits Agency Medical Services doctors. The doctors are trained to take an overall view of someone's capacity for work taking into account the degree to which their conditions vary and the effects of pain and fatigue.

We are looking at all aspects of provision for sick and disabled people as a part of our comprehensive spending review. During the review we shall take care to think about the particular needs of different groups and to assess whether the benefit system is addressing these in the right way.

Disabled People

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to improve incentives to work for disabled people. [21005]

Mr. Denham: The Government believe that work is the best form of welfare for people of working age, and are committed to improving opportunities and incentives for disabled people who want to work. Under our New Deal for people with a disability or long-term illness, up to £195 million, set aside from the Windfall Tax, will be used to finance a range of options aimed at helping participants, in the most effective way possible, to move into or stay in work. One key element of the New Deal will involve funding a number of innovative schemes to test ways of helping people who want to work, and the bidding process for this part of the programme was launched on 9 December. In parallel with these initiatives we are also considering what changes might be made to the benefit system to improve incentives and reduce disincentives to work.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many people have (a) applied for and (b) been awarded invalid care allowance in each of the last three years; [20672]

(2) how many people currently claim invalid care allowance. [20676]

Mr. Denham: The information is set out in the table.

Number of claims to invalid care allowance and awards made[1]

thousands

	Claims received	Awards made
1994	123	94
1995	152	104
1996	165	116

Notes:

1. The figures are derived from separate counts. The number of awards made in any year is not necessarily the result of claims received in that year. There will be some awards made on claims made in the preceding year, and some claims received that are not awarded until the following year.
2. As at 1 October 1997, there were 371,000 Invalid Care Allowances currently in payment.

Women Claimants

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of couples were in receipt of income support or income related jobseeker's allowance in which the woman is the claimant, for each year since 1990. [20678]

Mr. Field: The information is set out in the table:

Carer Benefits

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what benefits are available to those who care for others. [20675]

Mr. Denham: Carers have access to the full range of Social Security benefits depending on their individual circumstances. Invalid Care Allowance is the benefit intended specifically for carers. Carers may also qualify for the carer premium within the income related benefits.

Family Credit

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will list the number of (a) male and (b) female (i) earners and (ii) benefit recipients in couples in receipt of family credit at the latest date for which information is available. [20670]

Mr. Field: The information is set out in the table.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many persons in Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale were in receipt of family credit in each year since 1992. [19694]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The administration of Family Credit is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Gordon Prentice, dated 16 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people in Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale were in receipt of Family Credit (FC) during each year since 1992.

The information is not available in the format requested. FC is administered centrally by the Family Credit Unit. Statistics are produced on a national basis and provide the number of families in receipt of FC within a particular Benefits Agency (BA) local office area at a given date. This only serves as a "snap-shot" of the position at that date and does not indicate the number of families in receipt of FC annually.

Information on FC claims is normally destroyed after 18 months. However, the information requested is currently available from 1993 onwards and the figures for the two BA local offices within this area are as follows:

April	Burnley	Rossendale
1993	2,933	782
1994	3,393	864
1995	3,936	910
1996	4,171	800
1997	4,575	665

Figures are provisional and subject to change.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Welfare to Work

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement on the entitlement to benefits of those who agree to participate in Welfare to Work for long term sick and disabled schemes. [17724]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 November 1997]: The Government strongly believe that work is the best form of welfare for people of working age, and have set aside £195 million to fund a programme improving opportunities for sick and disabled people who want to work. We are currently consulting representatives from a number of disability organisations and employers on our initial proposals. These include funding a number of innovative schemes to explore how best to help people move into work or stay in work; introducing personal advisers to help sick and disabled people to overcome barriers to work; an information campaign to improve knowledge of the existing help available to help people into work and to change attitudes of benefit recipients, employers and the public; and a programme of research and evaluation to develop our understanding of the client group and to determine the effect of our initiatives. Participation in the welfare to work programme will be voluntary.

In addition we are examining the effect of benefit rules on incentives for sick and disabled people who want to work as part of our comprehensive spending review, and are considering the need for any changes. We are particularly keen that benefit rules should not discourage participation in the Welfare to Work programme.

We are committed to looking at ways of ending the exclusion of disabled people, and empowering them to play a full role in society. We want to develop an approach which focuses on people's abilities, instead of their disabilities.

Independent Tribunal Service

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action is being taken to reduce the waiting times for appeals heard by the Independent Tribunal Service. [20746]

Mr. Field: The operation of the appeals system is a matter for the Independent Tribunal Service.

However, we are determined to reduce the current delays and complexity in the appeals system. The Social Security Bill, which paves the way for modernising the delivery of social security, including the handling of appeals, had its third reading in the House on 10 December and is now continuing its passage through the House of Lords. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will assume responsibility for the administration of the appeals system. She will set and publish demanding targets for the administration of appeals and report on the results.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if recipients of disability living allowance who receive a questionnaire under the Benefits Integrity Programme are entitled to see a copy of their initial claim form; and what publicity his Department provides in respect of these arrangements. [20822]

Mr. Denham: One of our key aims is to rebuild integrity in, and public support for, the Social Security system and the way in which public money is spent. We need to focus on those who are properly entitled to benefit. This is why we have set up the Benefit Integrity Project.

The administration of this programme is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Paul Burstow, dated 16 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking whether recipients of Disability Living Allowance (DLA) who receive a questionnaire under the Benefits Integrity Programme are entitled to see a copy of their initial claim form; and what publicity his Department provides in respect of these arrangements.

The Benefit Integrity Project (BIP) was set up in response to the recent Benefit Review of DLA. Over the next two years, specially trained staff will make enquiries by postal questionnaire or home visit in over 400,000 cases to establish whether DLA is being paid correctly.

A copy of the original form will be sent to DLA recipients on request. We have had several useful meetings with organisations representing disabled people at which this provision was emphasised, as it was on the Does He Take Sugar? radio broadcast made by the Baroness Hollis of Heigham.

I hope that this is helpful.

Housing Benefit

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total number of housing benefit claimants for the benefit areas covering (1) Regent's Park and (2) Kensington North; how many of the claimants are (a) local authority, (b) housing association and (c) private tenants; and if he will list the (i) highest, (ii) average, (iii) median and (iv) upper and lower quartile payment figures for (a) to (c). [20975]

Mr. Field: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

The information relates to the London Boroughs of Westminster and Kensington and Chelsea.

Caseloads and weekly average amounts of housing benefit at the end of May 1997

TREASURY

Insurance Premium Tax

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the use of insurance premium tax as a marketing promotion by insurance retailers competing with travel agents. [20713]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 16 December 1997]: I have received a number of such representations.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the system for allowing United Kingdom transactions to be made in euros will also allow payments in other European currencies. [15917]

Mrs. Liddell: The banking sector has decided to put in place the necessary parallel infrastructure to handle euro transactions from 1 January 1999, for the financial markets, businesses and individuals. The infrastructure will not have the capability to allow transactions in other European foreign currencies.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the impact of the national minimum wage on job levels. [21046]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 17 December 1997]: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Ministerial colleagues have received a number of representations on this issue. The Government has asked the Low Pay Commission to take into account the wider effects on the economy in making its recommendations on the level and coverage of the minimum wage.

Pension Fund Contributions

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to change the current scales of tax relief available for pension fund contributions. [21343]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 17 December 1997]: We intend to maintain a framework for the tax treatment of pension arrangements that will encourage people to save for their retirement.

Savings

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the Government's target for the savings ratio by private investors; and by what date. [21341]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 17 December 1997]: Although there is no explicit target for the saving ratio, the Government want to encourage long-term savings and investment. The pursuit of economic stability is central to this goal. Moreover, the introduction of the new Individual Savings Accounts in 1999 will spread the savings culture by bringing the benefits of existing tax-favoured provision to a much wider population of savers.

Correspondence

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of the letters to hon. Members from the Financial Secretary to the Treasury have been signed by Ola Solaja on her behalf since 2 May. [21420]

Dawn Primarolo: I have received some 2,250 letters from hon. Members since 2 May. A breakdown of replies signed by my Private Secretaries on my behalf is not available. I approve the text of all letters to Members before they are sent.

Financial Services (Complaints and Compensation)

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Government's plans for reform of complaints handling and compensation schemes for financial services. [22011]

Mrs. Liddell: The Financial Services Authority has today published consultation documents on proposed arrangements for complaints-handling and compensation. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

We intend that there should be a single independent Financial Services Ombudsman. The Ombudsman will deal with unresolved complaints against all firms authorised by the Financial Services Authority.

The legislative framework for the Financial Services Ombudsman and for a single financial services compensation scheme will be included in the draft legislation to reform the regulatory system that the Government plan to publish for consultation next summer.

Consultation (Code of Practice)

Mr. Timms: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Code of Practice on consultation, mentioned in paragraph 5.1 of his Pre-Budget Report, will be published. [21875]

Dawn Primarolo: I am pleased to report that the Code of Practice on consultation, which will apply to consultations on tax policy in connection with the Budget and Finance Bill by the Inland Revenue, Customs and Excise and the Treasury, has today been made available on each of the departments' Internet sites. Printed versions will be available on request and copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Banks: From the information available, organisations in the Glasgow, Govan constituency have made 164 formal applications to the Lottery distributing bodies of which 59 have been successful, 85 unsuccessful and 20 are awaiting a final decision. The table shows the breakdown of applications by distributing body. The 59 successful awards have a total value of £4,763.715.

The Commission has awarded grant totalling £62,924,410 to four capital projects based in Glasgow. The Commission has also made a further award of £564,000 under the Millennium Awards to Individuals scheme.

British Museum

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assistance he has made available to the British Museum in 1997–98 and 1998–99 to enable it to avoid introducing admission charges in terms of (a) grant and (b) tax treatment; and if such arrangements are to be extended to other museums. [21114]

Mr. Chris Smith: I am holding in reserve within my Department's budget for 1998–99 £1 million for the British Museum. The purpose of this provision is to help the Trustees of the British Museum to avoid irrevocable decisions on the introduction of admission charges pending the outcome of the Government's Comprehensive Spending Review. Before this reserve can be accessed the British Museum will have to demonstrate their need for special provision, having looked at other sources of income. Payment of any advance grant would be subject to the following conditions:

(i) that the Museum prepares an action plan, subject to approval by my Department, for generating more income to supplement its grant-in-aid; for achieving significant efficiency savings; and for improvements to the management of the Museum's finances;

(ii) that the Museum succeeds in eliminating the balance of its projected deficit for the financial year 1998–99; and

(iii) that the Trustees of the British Museum maintain free entry throughout 1998.

I am also holding in reserve £300,000 for 1998–99 for the Tate Gallery to help them to maintain free entry pending the outcome of the Comprehensive Spending Review. Before this reserve can be accessed the Tate Gallery will have to demonstrate the need for this extra grant, having explored other sources of income.

No special tax measures or tax treatment are being offered to either the British Museum or the Tate Gallery.

In addition, I was able to announce to the House on 8 December the establishment by the Heritage Lottery Fund of an Access Fund, initially of £5 million per year, to enable all museums and galleries to bid for resources to help improve access to their collections in a variety of different ways.

Sportsmark Scheme

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to extend the Sportsmark scheme to primary schools. [21018]

Mr. Chris Smith: We have no plans to extend the Sportsmark scheme to primary schools. However, the English Sports Council are currently working on plans to introduce an Activity award for primary schools.

Tourism

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what is the scope and purpose of his Department's plan for tourism; and when it will be published. [21017]

Mr. Chris Smith: I aim to publish a comprehensive and detailed tourism strategy next summer, spelling out how the Government intend to create and sustain an improved framework within which tourism, hospitality and leisure can flourish.

Lottery White Paper

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many responses he has received to the White Paper, "The People's Lottery"; and if he will make a statement. [22125]

Mr. Chris Smith: I have received responses from nearly 500 organisations and over 90 individuals. The vast majority of these welcomed the Government's proposals for reforming the National Lottery. I have today placed a report summarising the main themes emerging from these responses in the Libraries of both Houses.

The White Paper announced the creation of a new Lottery good cause for health, education and the environment and of the National Endowment for Science Technology and the Arts. The National Lottery Bill, which was published on 4 December, gives effect to these proposals. The White Paper also committed £1 billion from the Lottery to the new good cause and NESTA by 2001. These funds will be split as follows:

- £300 million for training teachers and librarians in the use of new technology, including £50 million for digitising educational and learning materials held in schools and libraries;
- £300 million for out of school hours activities, with a further £100 million after 2001. £200 million will help local communities set up out of school childcare clubs across the UK, to meet the needs of working parents. £180 million will provide out of school hours learning activities in half of all secondary schools and a quarter of all primary schools. A further £20 million will fund integrated schemes offering childcare and learning;
- £200 million for healthy living centres, with a further £100 million after 2001, to establish a network designed to serve around 20 per cent. of the population; and
- £200 million as an endowment for NESTA, sufficient to provide an income which will move NESTA into the top ten grant giving endowment funds in the UK.

Public Expenditure

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what decisions he has taken on public expenditure allocations for 1998–99. [22126]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department's spending plans for next year are listed in the table. I am today writing to the Chairmen of funded bodies informing them of the grant they can expect next year.

I have generally chosen to maintain settlements at the level planned last year. Some adjustments have however had to be made to reflect the costs to the UK of increases in related European Community budget programmes and to reflect transfers of responsibility to and from my Department. My objective throughout has been to ensure that the bodies I fund can continue to deliver their existing services within the total provision for expenditure that was announced last year.

These allocations do not necessarily reflect my longer term priorities. These will be set in the Departmental Spending Review and will provide the foundation for a different approach to resource allocation in the future. I look forward to working with our funded bodies to make this a reality.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Judicial Appointments Commission

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what factors underlay his decision not to proceed with the establishment of a judicial appointments commission. [20377]

Mr. Hoon: In the light of the other substantial priorities facing the Department, including the very heavy workload connected with legal aid and civil justice reforms, my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor has decided not to proceed with further work on a possible Commission but to concentrate on making those changes he regards as most urgent in the existing system. He has decided to act directly to improve the openness, flexibility and effectiveness of the judicial appointments process. New measures include the presentation of an annual report to Parliament on the operation of the judicial appointments system (the first report will cover the period 1998–99).

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many magistrates serve on the active list of (a) the Harwich and (b) the Tendring petty sessional divisions. [20586]

Mr. Hoon: 16 magistrates serve on the active list of the Harwich Petty Sessional Division and 30 magistrates serve on the Tendring Petty Sessional Division.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many magistrates serve on the active list of the Colchester Petty Sessional Division; how many live within the Division; and how many live in the Colchester constituency. [20588]

Mr. Hoon: There are 84 magistrates on the active list of the Colchester Petty Sessional Division. 78 live within the Division; 34 live within the area of the Colchester constituency and a further 25 live within the area of the adjacent constituency of North Essex.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what consultations his Department has had on the amalgamation of the Colchester, Harwich and Tendring magistrates benches; and if he will make a statement. [20587]

Mr. Hoon: My Department has not undertaken, or taken part in, any consultations on the proposed amalgamation.

Section 33 of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997 provides that a magistrates' courts committee may submit to the Lord Chancellor a draft order proposing changes to the petty sessional divisions, or PSDs, in its area. Section 34 of the Act requires a magistrates' courts committee to consult all the magistrates of the affected benches and relevant paying authority, before the Lord Chancellor may consider any application for change under section 33.

I can confirm that an application to reorganise a number of PSDs in Essex, including Colchester, Harwich and Tendring, was received from Essex MCC on 17 November 1997.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Equal Opportunities Commission

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what are his Department's proposals in respect of the Equal Opportunities Commission's grant-in-aid budget for 1998. [20998]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Grant-in-Aid for the Equal Opportunities Commission in 1998–99 will be set out in the DfEE Departmental Report, to be published in the new year.

New Deal

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the advantages of extending the New Deal programme to those economically inactive individuals who are not officially registered as unemployed. [21317]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Both the New Deal for Lone Parents and the New Deal for Disabled People offer support to people who have been economically inactive. We will evaluate the impact of our welfare to work programmes and keep their coverage under review.

International Labour Conference

Mr. MacShane: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has for publishing the White Paper on the instruments adopted at the 83rd Session of the International Labour Conference and the instrument for the amendment of the ILO Constitution adopted at the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference. [22018]

Mr. Andrew Smith: I have today published a White Paper entitled "International Labour Conference", copies of which have been placed in Library.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if his Department's estimates of the total costs of resolving the millennium compliance problem include costs relating to the embedded chip problem; and if he will make a statement. [21562]

Dr. Howells: Yes. Departmental costings relating to the embedded chip issue were itemised in the reply on 4 November 1997, Official Report, column 163, given to the hon. Member on our estimates of the total cost of addressing the millennium compliance problem.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what millennium compliance problems have occurred to date in his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) other public bodies; and if he will make a statement. [21561]

Dr. Howells: The Department has anticipated the potential for problems where its systems hold data that include dates beyond Year 2000 and/or where such systems manipulate these dates. All such systems have been identified and timely corrective action is being taken. No other specific problems have been identified either within the Department, its agency or the Non Departmental Public Bodies responsible to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment.

Unemployment Forecasts

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish his Department's internal forecasts of the level of UK unemployment over the next two years; and if he will make a statement. [21355]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The DfEE does not forecast unemployment. The current planning assumption, set out in "Securing Britain's long-term economic future" Pre-Budget Report November 1997, is for unemployment to remain flat at its October 1997 level.

Beef (Schools)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice he has issued to local education authorities about the inclusion of beef on the school menu. [21605]

Ms Estelle Morris: In March 1996, the Department issued to all schools and local education authorities in England a statement made by the then Secretary of State for Health, together with a statement by the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee (SEAC), about the implications of the evidence on BSE for children and for school meal provision.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what statistics his Department collates as to which countries supply beef to British schools. [21602]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Department does not collect this information.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the number of schools which have removed beef from the menu. [21604]

Ms Estelle Morris: The content of school meals is a matter for individual local education authorities and grant-maintained schools, and the Department has not collected information on or made estimates of the number of schools not serving beef.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Women's Prisons (Overcrowding)

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent assessment he has made of the level of overcrowding in women's prisons. [19285]

Ms Quin: There are two measures of overcrowding: prisoners held two to a cell designed for one and prisoners held above the designated uncrowned capacity.

158 female prisoners were held two to a cell designed for one at four prisons at the end of October 1997: 60 at Cookham Wood; 56 at Low Newton; 10 at Risley; and 32 at Winchester.

The Prison Service also uses the concept of Certified Normal Accommodation (CNA) to define the uncrowded capacity of an establishment. Expressing the actual population as a percentage of the CNA can be used as a measure of occupancy. This measure takes into account all types of accommodation including single and double cells, rooms and dormitories.

The table shows the CNA of female establishments and the population on 28 November 1997.

Young Offenders

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many 15 to 17 year old offenders received a sentence of (a) 15 months and (b) 21 months detention in a young offender institution in the most recent year for which figures are available. [20295]

Mr. Michael: In 1996, a total of 1,760 offenders aged 15, 16 or 17 were sentenced to detention in a young offender institution. Of these, 131 (7 per cent.) received a sentence of 15 months and 103 (6 per cent.) received a sentence of 21 months.

Cannabis

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many applications have been made for a licence to research and trial the medical use of cannabis or cannabis derivatives; and on what date each licence was granted; [20629]

(2) if he will list the individuals and organisations which have current licences from his Department permitting the research and trial of cannabis or cannabis derivatives for medical use. [20628]

Mr. George Howarth: According to existing records, a total of twenty two applications have been made for cannabis related research. All were granted and nineteen are currently valid. Of these, six are directly concerned with medical research. The licensee and date of grant of those six are as follows:

Dr. G. M. Stern, Middlesex Hospital—11 August 1988

Dr. P. Taylor, Bethlehem Hospital—27 February 1989

Dr. A. Holdcroft, Hammersmith Hospital—1 December 1994

Dr. R. Pertwee, University of Aberdeen—7 April 1974

Professor A. Smith, University of Oxford—1 August 1993

Mr. D. Todd, James Paget Hospital—1 May 1995.

The first three of these licences have now lapsed; the others remain in force.

Immigration Detainees

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 13 November 1997, Official Report, column 645, for what reasons immigration detainees are held in prison establishments other than Haslar and Rochester; what arrangements are made to separate immigration detainees from convicted prisoners; what extra (a) facilities and (b) provision is made for immigration detainees above that for convicted prisoners; and what language interpretation is provided for immigration detainees who have limited command of the English language. [20957]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Under an agreement with the Prison Service, a number of places are made available for immigration detainees in Prison Service establishments other than Haslar and Rochester.

Detainees are normally held either together in a separate block of living accommodation or with unconvicted prisoners. They are treated in the same way as unconvicted prisoners for purposes of prison management, and as such have the special rights and privileges under Prison rules and instructions which flow from unconvicted status.

Translation services are available under a contract administered by the Immigration and Nationality Directorate; every establishment has access to Language Line, a 24-hour telephone interpreting service, which is subsidised centrally; a list of accredited interpreters is available from the National Register of Public Service Interpreters, which is administered by the Institute of Linguists; establishments have been advised to maintain a list of members of staff and prisoners who can speak foreign languages and of any community services available locally. A number of foreign language documents, issued centrally by the Prison Service, are made available to non-English speaking prisoners and detainees explaining prison rules and procedures.

Deportation Orders

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) deportation orders have been signed by Ministers and (b) removals have taken place since 1 May. [20887]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The number of deportation orders signed by Ministers between 1 May 1997 and 30 September 1997 was 468. Information on removals during the same period is given in table 1.

Table 1: Persons removed from the United Kingdom, 1 May 1997 to 30 September 1997

	Number of persons removed[1]
Removal as a result of deportation action[2, 3]	648
Removal as a result of illegal entry action[2, 4]	2,015
Removal under port procedures[2]	10,574
Total removals	13,237

[1] These figures are provisional.
[2] Action may have been initiated in an earlier period.
[3] Includes persons who departed voluntarily after deportation action had been initiated.
[4] Includes persons who departed voluntarily after illegal entry action had been initiated.

Young People in Care

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many young people in each of the last three years have been remanded in the care of the local authority by courts. [20691]

Mr. Boateng: I have been asked to reply.

During the year ending 31 March 1996, the latest for which figures are available, 1,600 young people were remanded, or committed for trial or sentence, into the care of local authorities in England. The equivalent figures for the years ending 31 March 1995 and 1994 were 1,530 and 1,440 respectively.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many young people presently remanded in the care of the local authority are (a) excluded from school and (b) not excluded from school; [20690]

(2) what is the average number of hours per week of education undertaken by young people who are remanded in the care of the local authority who are (a) excluded from school and (b) not excluded from school. [20688]

Mr. Michael: Information on the education of those remanded in the care of the local authority is not collected centrally but I have obtained some related information from the Department for Education and Employment and the Office for Standards in Education (OFSTED).

Surveys indicate that children in local authority care are more likely to be excluded from school than other groups, but there is no information on how many exclusions involve those remanded into care.

Most young people remanded will go into residential care with on-site schools and will not be excluded from school. Children not excluded from school will be subject to a standard school week (24 hours for those aged 14 to 16, Key stage 4).

Where a child is permanently excluded from school the Local Education Authority (LEA) is under a duty to provide suitable education. LEAS generally meet this duty through education in a pupil referral unit, which may be full or part-time, or by arranging home tuition for an average of around five hours a week.

A 1995 report "The Education of Children who are looked after by the Local Authority" produced jointly by the Department of Health Social Services Inspectorate and OFSTED examined the school attendance records of a broad group of 1,205 children, looked after in local authority foster and residential care. Information from that report appears in the following table.

School attendance at each Key Stage

Per cent.

	Key Stage 1 (4–7 years)	Key Stage 2 (7–11 years)	Key Stage 3 (11–14 years)	Key Stage 4 (14–16 years)	Total
Permanently excluded[1]	—	0.6	2.1	3.9	1.9
Fixed term exclusion[1,2]	—	0.3	3.0	2.8	1.7
attendance	2.1	1.6	7.3	18.9	8.4
problem indicated	87.1	92.5	82.4	66.9	81.2
information given	10.8	5.0	5.2	7.5	6.7
Total numbers	194	322	329	360	1,205

[1] Numbers relate to children excluded at the time of the census. Information was not collected about previous experience of exclusion.
[2] When this study was undertaken, fixed term exclusion applied for a maximum of 15 days in any one term. Since legislative changes introduced in 1997 fixed term exclusion can now extend to 45 days in any one year.

Horse Racing

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of British-based stallions commanding a fee of £10,000 or more. [21180]

Mr. George Howarth: The estimated number of British-based stallions commanding a fee of £10,000 or more is 19.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will estimate the ratio of overall income to overall costs of race horse owners in the United Kingdom, Germany and Japan; [21187]

(2) if he will publish the percentage of keep and training fees recoverable through prize money in the principle horse racing countries. [21190]

Mr. George Howarth: The percentage of keep and training fees recoverable through prize money in the principal horse racing nations is estimated as follows:

	Per cent.
Hong Kong	149
Japan	83
South Africa	64
Canada	59
Italy	57
France	49

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the overall costs and overall income of racing horse owners in the Untied Kingdom. [21186]

Mr. George Howarth: The British Horseracing Board estimate the overall costs and overall income of racing horse owners in the United Kingdom as follows:

(a) overall costs = £202 million (including entry fees)

(b) overall income = £49 million (total prize money less owners' entry fees and before any deductions to trainers, jockeys etc).

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the costs and returns to the owner of the a horse winning three Class E races. [21181]

Mr. George Howarth: The British Horseracing Board estimate the costs and returns to the owner of a horse winning three Class E races as:

(a) Costs = £15,200

(b) Returns = £12,600.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the effects of replacing betting duty on turnover with charging duty on gross profits. [21184]

Mr. George Howarth: This matter is properly for my Treasury colleagues. However, they tell me that general betting duty on stakes yielded £453 million in 1996–97; the yield of a duty on gross profit would depend on the rate charged and gross profit levels.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate Britain's place in the world rankings of returns to race horse owners. [21191]

Mr. George Howarth: Britain's place in the world rankings of percentage returns to racehorse owners is 36th of 41.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet the Al Maktoum family to discuss the future of racing and the bloodstock industry. [21307]

Mr. George Howarth: We understand that there are plans for the British Horseracing Board to meet Sheikh Mohammed in the near future.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the economic effects of (a) doubling the returns and (b) halving the losses of race horse owners. [21188]

Mr. George Howarth: The British Horseracing Board estimate the economic effects of doubling the returns of racehorse owners to be:

New owners: 1,945

New horses: 2,867

Income: £132.3 million

Employment opportunities: 7,050.

No research has been carried out on the effect of halving the losses of racehorse owners.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of jobs in (a) motor racing and (b) the racing and bloodstock industries, excluding betting. [21179]

Mr. George Howarth: It is estimated that there are some 50,000 jobs in the United Kingdom motorsports industry, including support services, and 59,300 jobs (31,600 direct and 27,700 indirect) in the racing and bloodstock industries, excluding betting.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the percentages and amounts of betting duty levy put to prize money during each of the past 20 years. [21183]

Mr. George Howarth: The following table provided by the Horserace Betting Levy Board, sets out the annual contributions to prize money from the statutory levy on off-course betting.

General Betting Duty, currently 6.7 per cent. on off-course stakes, is paid to the Exchequer.

(b) halve the losses of racehorse owners would be £97 million.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the returns to race horse owners in (a) Britain, (b) Poland, (c) Mauritius and (d) Greece. [21192]

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will estimate the number of horses in training for racing. [21182]

Mr. George Howarth: The number of horses in training for racing is estimated at 12,279 (average figure for 1996).

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review gambling legislation and taxation. [21185]

Mr. George Howarth: We have no immediate plans to review the gambling legislation.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer reviews gaming and betting duties each year in the run up to the Budget.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the potential public order consequences of the year 2000 problem. [20973]

Mr. Michael: It is for individual chief police officers to ensure that their computer controlled systems are Year 2000 compliant. They are currently assessing the scale of the problem and taking action where appropriate, with help from the Police Information Technology Organisation. Police forces are also pursuing Year 2000 compliance with other bodies responsible for systems whose failure might have policing implications. Failure to comply could seriously affect police forces' functioning and could lead to additional calls on their services in a range of areas.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what millennium compliance have occurred to date in his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) other public bodies; and if he will make a statement. [21563]

Mr. Straw: A small number of millennium compliance problems have occurred in my Department affecting management information, statistical and payroll data. These problems have been quickly resolved. No problems have occurred in either agencies or other public bodies.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department's estimates of the total costs of resolving the millennium compliance problem include costs relating to the embedded chip problem; and if he will make a statement. [21564]

Mr. Straw: My Department's estimates of the total costs of resolving the millennium compliance problem do include costs relating to the embedded chip problem.

Racial Violence

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from (a) Thames Valley Police and (b) others about the attack on a Sikh boy in Slough on 24 November; what steps he is taking to combat racist attacks; and if he will make a statement. [21193]

Mr. Michael: I was extremely concerned to hear about this incident and I hope that the child and his family are recovering from what must have been an extremely frightening and distressing experience. I understand that an investigation by Thames Valley Police is under way and the family can be assured that the police are treating this matter very seriously.

I have so far received three letters from the Sikh community in the Slough area concerning this attack.

The Government condemn all acts of racial violence and harassment. This is why we announced in the Crime and Disorder Bill new measures to tackle racially motivated crime. The offences will correspond to the existing main offences which deal with violence against the person and offences of harassment. The Government believe that the introduction of specific racial offences will send out a strong message that racial violence and harassment are unacceptable, and will act as a forceful deterrent. Specific offences will also encourage the victims of crimes to report them to the police, and ensure that a higher priority is given to the identification of the racial element, both in the gathering of evidence and in the prosecution of the case.

The Racial Incidents Standing Committee (RISC) has been created to take forward work between various agencies concerned with racial incidents. The group comprises the Home Office and other Government Departments, agencies from the criminal justice system, the Commission for Racial Equality and the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders. RISC will tackle issues such as the effectiveness of multi-agency panels in dealing with racial incidents; the implications of the new offences in the Crime and Disorder Bill; and how racial incidents are policed.

On 31 July, my right hon. Friend also announced an inquiry into the matters arising from the death of Stephen Lawrence in order to identify the lessons to be learnt for the investigation and prosecution of racially motivated crimes.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Certificate of Designation for Huntingdon Life Sciences was amended on 23 May to allow the breeding and supply to other licensed establishments. [21253]

Mr. George Howarth: I confirmed in my reply to the hon. Member on 24 November 1997, Official Report, column 439, that the Certificate of Designation was amended on 23 May to allow the breeding of dogs.

Under the terms of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, subsection 10(3)(a), dogs used in scientific procedures must normally be obtained from designated breeding establishments. There are no restrictions under the Act which prevent a designated breeding establishment from providing dogs to other establishments.

Ms Kingham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if the temporary accommodation in which breeding beagles are housed at Huntingdon Life Sciences at Occold meets the recommendations of the code of practice for the housing and care of animals in designated breeding and supplying establishments when the licence was granted; [21037]

(2) for what reasons the Certificate of Designation for Huntingdon Life Sciences was amended to allow the breeding of dogs before planning approval to build kennels had been granted. [21036]

Mr. George Howarth: The company first discussed the idea of breeding dogs with the Home Office in late 1996. The proposed accommodation had not been built, equipped or staffed specifically for the breeding of laboratory dogs. In some minor ways it did not, at that stage, meet all the requirements of the code of practice for the housing and care of animals in designated breeding and supplying establishments. The Inspectorate asked that some changes be made to the facilities in which the dogs were to be housed to meet the requirements of the code of practice. These changes were completed before the formal application for an amendment to the Certificate of Designation to allow breeding was submitted.

The Certificate holder submitted the formal application in May. By this time, the conditions met the requirements of the code of practice. The inspector for this establishment and another inspector with a specialist interest in breeding establishments had thoroughly inspected the accommodation and assessed the proposed staffing arrangements. There was no legitimate reasons to refuse the application.

Should it receive planning permission, the new dog breeding facility planned by the company will exceed the minimum requirements of the code of practice and will also allow the company to expand its breeding colony. This is currently being limited by the Home Office to a size which is appropriate for the current accommodation and facilities.

Perverting the Course of Justice

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been convicted for perverting the course of justice and given a custodial sentence in each year since 1987; and what was the average length of sentence. [21104]

Mr. Michael: The information is given in the table.

Video Recordings

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to make changes to the authority responsible for making arrangements for the classification of video works under the Video Recordings Act 1984. [21667]

Mr. Straw: I have today laid before both Houses details of my proposal to designate Mr. Andreas Whittam Smith under section 4(4) of the Video Recordings Act 1984. The British Board of Film Classification (BBFC) earlier today announced that Mr. Whittam Smith will be appointed as their President from 1 January 1998, and I propose to designate him, in that capacity, to replace the Earl of Harewood and Lord Birkett of Ulverston. The designation itself will come into force in accordance with the procedures laid down in section 5 of the Act. This requires that the particulars of the proposal should lie before both Houses of Parliament for 40 days before the designation can be made, provided that neither House resolves during that period that the designation should not be made.

I have placed in the Library a copy of my designation proposal and the text of a letter I intend to send at the time of designation to Mr. Whittam Smith.

Mr. Whittam Smith has impressed me with his understanding of the issues relating to the responsibility of a designated authority and I expect him to provide strong leadership for the BBFC into the next millennium.

Immigration Policy

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the review of immigration policy on carer cases will be completed. [21533]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: This review is nearing completion.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: A total of 1,029 applications were received for six posts. Twenty-one candidates were shortlisted for interview. I expect to make a decision on appointments shortly.

Boundary Commission

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans the Boundary Commission has to conduct an interim review of parliamentary constituencies in England. [22015]

Mr. Straw: The Commission has informed me that it intends to consider making a report on parliamentary constituencies in Berkshire, Buckinghamshire and Surrey, in Greater London and Surrey, and also in Greater London. The Commission intends to commence forthwith an interim review of parliamentary constituencies in each of those areas.

15 December	18

The figures include General Receptions, working lunches and dinners as well as other functions.

Total costs are not available in the form requested; nor are details of functions and numbers of guests in the year leading up to 2 May. However, for expenditure on official hospitality within my Department I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service on 5 December 1997, Official Report, columns 376–77.

Duty Free Shopping

Mr. Gale: To ask the Prime Minister what plans the Government has during the United Kingdom presidency of the European Union to secure the survey promised by the Commission of the potential number of job losses that will arise from the ending of the trade in duty free goods. [21165]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The Government have no plans to use the UK presidency to press for a Commission survey. However, the UK will not stand in the way of any proposal for a Commission study particularly if this were to also examine the nature of any successor regime to duty free.

Structural Funds

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on what was agreed at the Luxembourg European Council on the application of the Structural Funds to sparsely populated areas. [21801]

The Prime Minister: Although an earlier draft of the Council Conclusions contained a reference to sparsely populated areas, the text finally agreed did not. Several Member States argued for a less extensive passage on the Structural and Cohesion Funds on the grounds that decisions are not needed before the Commission produce detailed proposals. I regret any confusion about this resulting from my answer to the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing), on 15 December 1997, Official Report, column 29.

Government Receptions

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Prime Minister what criteria determine who is included on guest lists for Government receptions at 10 Downing Street. [21339]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 17 December 1997]: If the Reception has a particular theme, such as health, then the draft guest list is submitted by the Government Department concerned. For a "General" Reception, suggestions for draft guest lists are submitted from Government Departments, Ministers and members of the public.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Helms-Burton Legislation

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government intends to take to persuade the United States of America to repeal the Helms-Burton legislation. [21316]

Mr. Doug Henderson: We, along with our EU partners, take every opportunity to make it clear to the United States of America our opposition to the Helms-Burton Act.

Turkey

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the earliest date on which Turkey may be admitted as a full member of the EU; and if he will make a statement. [21312]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Turkey's application to join the EU will be judged on its merits and according to objective criteria, as will those of all other applicants. Turkey's progress towards EU membership will depend on the pace of political and economic reform in Turkey, and on Turkey's commitment to the EU's objectives and values.

Immigration

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the case of Mr. Mohammid Fazal who has applied for a visa to become a teacher at the Jarim Islamia Rizwia Mosque, Bradford; and what factors underlie the delays in processing his application. [21500]

Mr. Fatchett: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Baroness Symons, sent a letter to my hon. Friend about this case on 17 December.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when a decision will be made on the application for entry clearance by Arshad Khan at Islamabad High Commission, ref. D8342. [21532]

Mr. Fatchett: The Entry Clearance Officer at Islamabad authorised the issue of a settlement visa to Mr. Khan on 9 December. The Migration and Visa Correspondence Unit wrote to my hon. Friend on 16 December to inform him of this decision.

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the case of Nasim Akhtar who has applied for a permit to join her husband Mr. Mohammed Iqbal of Mountbatten Court, Bradford; and what factors underlie the delay in processing this application. [21501]

Mr. Fatchett: Inquiries made in response to earlier representations from my hon. Friend show that there is no trace of an application from Mrs. Akhtar at the British High Commission at Islamabad.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the application for entry clearance by Mohammed Aurangyeb, Islamabad ref. IMM/D7004, was referred to the Home Office for further inquiries; what is the nature of those inquiries; and when he expects them to be completed and a decision made. [21531]

Mr. Fatchett: We have asked our High Commission in Islamabad to provide a detailed account of the position. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Baroness Symons, will write to my hon. Friend within one week of receiving that account.

Arms Exports

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of France towards establishing common principles for the licensing of arms exports as part of a European code of conduct. [19869]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have had a number of contacts at Ministerial and Official level with the French and other European Union Governments about a Code of Conduct on arms exports in the lead-up to formal consideration of a Code during the UK's Presidency of the Union in the first half of 1998.

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the approval of an export licence for the supply to the Netherlands of shotgun ammunition intended for use in Bosnia. [21681]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We recently approved the export to The Netherlands of 2,500 rounds of CS gas and target-practice shotgun ammunitions for use in riot-control by Dutch UN armed forces in Bosnia. Given that the ammunition is needed to support peace-keeping activities in Bosnia and that it is important that UN forces in Bosnia, which include British troops, are able to protect themselves, we were glad to be able to approve this export as an exception to our interpretation of the EU arms embargo on the former Yugoslavia. This decision does not affect our continued support of the EU common position on arms exports to the former Yugoslavia.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Motorcycling

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set up a national motorcycle strategy group to discuss the role of motorcycling in an integrated transport policy. [20626]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My noble Friend the Minister for Roads and Road Safety, Baroness Hayman, invited representatives of a wide range of groups including motorcyclists, pedestrians, cyclists and environmentalists, to a special seminar on 25 November to discuss the role of motorcycling in integrated transport. This discussion provided valuable information for us to consider policies on motorcycling in the integrated transport White Paper to be published next year.

Car Registrations

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what plans he has to change the month in which new car registration letters are introduced; [20936]

(2) if he will make a statement on the Government's policy in respect of car registration plates. [20935]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government is proposing that, from March 1999, the age identification letter on vehicle registration plates should change every six months, in March and September. The current R prefix would therefore run until the end of July 1998, and S would run from August 1998 to the end of February 1999.

The current sequence of age identification letters should therefore expire in September 2001. Following the consultation exercise this year, we are currently discussing with the motor industry and other interested parties, including the police, a new vehicle registration format to run from that date. We intend to make a full announcement concerning the changes in the new year.

The Government is concerned at the use of non-standard fonts, which cause difficulties for the police. We intend to tighten the existing regulations, and to introduce a standard mandatory number-plate font. My Department is working with the British Standards Institution and representatives of the motor industry towards finalizing an appropriate standard.

Planning Inspectors

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many planning inspectors are currently in post. [20943]

Mr. Raynsford: The Chief Planning Inspector, Chris Shepley, is responsible for providing information about the Planning Inspectorate's operational affairs. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from David Hanchet to Mr. Keith Vaz, dated 18 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions has asked Chris Shepley to reply to your Question about the number of Planning Inspectors. As he is on leave I am replying on his behalf.

As at 1 December 1997 there were 377 Planning Inspectors: 236 employed on a salaried basis and 141 who were fee-paid.

A449 (Safety)

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what new proposals have been made by the Highways Agency to improve safety on the A449 between Kidderminster and Worcester; and if he will make a statement. [20759]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Nutt to Mr. Peter Luff, dated 18 December 1997:

Glenda Jackson has asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency to reply to your question about what new proposals the Agency has to improve safety on the A449 between Kidderminster and Worcester. Lawrie Haynes, the Chief Executive has asked me to reply as he is away from the Office at present.

As you know, the Highways Agency shares your concern about the continuing accident problem on this section of the A449. The report we mentioned in our letter to you of 12 November was received earlier this month. It recommends a number of measures aimed at improving safety and reducing excessive traffic speed both in the short and longer term.

Now that we have had an opportunity to consider the report we propose to accept its recommendations for improved turning facilities at selected junctions (similar to those already in place at Hadley Turn), closing some of the gaps in the central reserve and introducing a 50 mph speed limit to be enforced by the introduction of speed cameras. We intend to implement the short term measures quickly for the immediate benefits they will bring.

As a first step we will discuss these proposals with the Parish Councils concerned early in the new year. We will also ensure that these measures are now worked up in greater detail to enable them to be displayed locally and implemented at the earliest possible opportunity next year.

Consultants have also been instructed to prepare proposals for the introduction of central reserve safety fencing along those parts of the route where it is not already in place.

The longer term solution will take more time to develop and statutory procedures will need to be completed. We will write to you again when we have more information to report on this matter.

In the meantime, I am sure that Tom Barry, Area Manager for the A449, would be happy to explain the proposals in more detail. Tom can be contacted on 0121-678-8366.

Drivers

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on the age of eligibility for drivers. [20934]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The prescribed minimum ages for driving different types of vehicle are set out below. However, the law allows lower minimum ages in special circumstances.

Age	Vehicle
16	Mopeds
17	Cars and other small vehicles up to 3.5 tonnes and with up to 8 passenger seats; motorbikes;
18	Goods vehicles between 3.5 and 7.5 tonnes;
21	Goods vehicles over 7.5 tonnes and passenger vehicles with more than 8 seats.

The EC Driving Licence Directive, with which these accord, includes a derogation allowing cars to be driven at 17, rather than 18. There are no plans to change that or any other minimum age.

Christmas Island

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will evaluate the potential environmental hazards posed by the climatic changes arising from the El Niño phenomenon in the Pacific Ocean in respect of the rainfall and hurricane patterns affecting Christmas Island. [20785]

Mr. Meacher: During an El Niño event, there is a substantial increase in rainfall throughout the year in the central equatorial Pacific region which includes Christmas Island. Since the onset of the current major El Niño, rainfall has been well above average in this region since March 1997, and this pattern is expected to continue until El Niño declines, probably by the middle of next year.

As Christmas Island is close to the equator, it is extremely unlikely to experience hurricanes.

Royal Train

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many miles the Royal Train has travelled in the period January 1996 to date when carrying (a) the Queen, (b) the Prince of Wales and (c) other members of the Royal Family; and how many journeys were undertaken by persons in these categories. [21109]

Ms Glenda Jackson: From 1 January 1996 until 31 March 1997 the Royal Train travelled some 9,500 miles while carrying members of the Royal Family. During this period, nine journeys were undertaken by HM the Queen, 15 journeys by HRH the Prince of Wales, and 12 journeys by other members of the Royal Family.

From 1 April 1997, the costs of official Royal travel by rail and air have been met by the Royal Household. The arrangements under which grant-in-aid is paid to the Household to support these costs require the Household to prepare an annual report on the use that has been made of the grant-in-aid. Particulars of the journeys made by the Royal Train from 1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998 will be included in the first such annual report which is to be published and placed in the Library of the House within three months of the end of the financial year.

Millennium Experience

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans have been made to cope with the likely increase in the number of cars entering the Greenwich area to visit the Millennium Experience in 2000. [21260]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The vast majority of visitors to the Millennium Experience will travel by public transport using one of a variety of modes that will be available. There will be no car parking at the site, other than for orange badge holders, and a controlled parking zone stretching up to three kilometres from the site. Visitors will be encouraged to leave their cars and join public transport as close to home as possible. Park and ride or park and sail sites will also be available linked to the Experience by rail, bus or boat.

Leasehold Law

Mr. Lepper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about consultation on the reform of residential leasehold law. [20968]

Mr. Raynsford: We are committed to simplifying the current rules restricting the purchase of freeholds by leaseholders and are considering what other aspects of residential leasehold law might be reformed. We hope to issue a consultation paper next spring.

Road Traffic Act Appeals (Scotland)

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to increase the 21 day time limit in Scotland for an appeal under section 100 of the Road Traffic Act 1988. [21236]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Appeals under section 100 are among those to which the Act of Sederunt (Sheriff Court Summary Application Rules) 1993 applies. We have no plans to change these arrangements.

Road Tax Licences

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many motor vehicle owners have been charged and convicted of not holding a current road tax licence since 1 January. [21380]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number of people successfully prosecuted for Vehicle Excise Duty evasion since 1 January is 208,950.

In addition a further 246,188 evaders paid an out of court settlement.

West Sussex Structure Plan

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his recent decision regarding the West Sussex Structure Plan; and for what reasons he rejected the proposals made by the Examination in Public. [21777]

Mr. Raynsford: No. It would not be appropriate for my right hon. Friend to make a statement in view of the stated intention of West Sussex County Council to seek a judicial review of his decision. The reasons for the decision are set out in the letter accompanying my right hon. Friend's direction to the County Council and I am sending the hon. Member a copy.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his latest estimate of the total cost of resolving the computer millennium problem in (a) his Department, (b) its agencies and (c) other public bodies for which he is responsible; what is in each case (i) expenditure incurred to date, (ii) expenditure planned for 1997–98, (iii) expenditure planned for 1998–99 and (iv) expenditure planned for 1999–2000. [21530]

Angela Eagle: The figures are provided in the following table:

£ million

	Latest estimate of total cost (£)	Expenditure incurred to date (£)	Expenditure planned for
			1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000
DETR (C)	2.2	0.2	0.5	1.5	0.2
Executive Agencies[1]	15.7	0.095	2.2	13.5
Other Public Bodies[2]	n.a	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a

[1] The figure includes £10.7 million estimated by the Highways Agency (HA) to upgrade traffic control systems and the like. This amount was not included in the statement made by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to the House of Commons on 27 November 1997 concerning how Government Departments and their Agencies are tackling the Year 2000 Date Change Problem. This covered only the cost of achieving compliance in HA's IT systems (estimated at £4.3 million). HA has not been able to break down expenditure planned between 1998–99 and 1999–2000.

[2] Information on Y2000 costs for other public bodies is not maintained centrally.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what additional financial support will be made available to local authorities to allow them to achieve millennium computer compliance; and if he will make a statement. [21577]

Mr. Raynsford: The LGA's views on the pressures faced by authorities, including the costs of millennium compliance, were taken into account in our proposals for local government revenue expenditure in 1998–99.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his estimate of the total cost to local authorities of achieving millennium computer compliance by 31 December 1999; and if he will make a statement. [21545]

Mr. Raynsford: The Local Government Association (LGA) highlighted the possible level of pressures local authorities might face in the coming financial year in preparing for millennium computer compliance. Their estimate was that spending of at least £100 million will be required in 1998–99, although they recognised that firm estimates are difficult to obtain. The LGA's views on the pressures faced by authorities were taken into account in our proposals for local government revenue expenditure in 1998–99.

Air Jamaica

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reasons his Department did not allow Air Jamaica rights to operate passenger flights to Manchester Airport in 1996. [21538]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Air services negotiations between the UK and Jamaica were held in Kingston on 24–26 January 1996. The question of allowing Air Jamaica to operate services to Manchester was discussed at the negotiations, but no agreement was reached. The UK negotiators considered that the conditions which the Jamaican authorities were seeking to attach to the service would have damaged wider UK aviation interests. No representations have been made to the UK Government by Air Jamaica since those negotiations.

Asylum Seekers (Housing)

Mr. Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to allow local authorities to use their own housing stock for asylum seekers where the authority is under a statutory duty to provide accommodation.[22012]

Ms Armstrong: The Government is currently undertaking a comprehensive spending review of asylum policy, including a review of the policy for providing support to asylum seekers. We recognise that some local authorities, particularly in London, are experiencing difficulties in accommodating asylum seekers to whom various statutory duties are owed.

Consequently, in response to a request from the Association of London Government, the Government proposes to make an Order under section 9 of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 which will allow local housing authorities in England and Wales to grant non-secure tenancies and licences in their own housing stock to asylum seekers to whom they owe a statutory duty to provide accommodation.

Authorities will also be able to let their housing stock to other landlords who intend to sub-let the accommodation, on a temporary basis, to asylum seekers who are owed a duty.

Additionally, I intend to invite the Housing Corporation to consider relaxing its guidance, in respect of the use of registered social landlords' long-term stock, to allow them some flexibility in supporting local authorities which owe a statutory duty to accommodate asylum seekers.

These proposals will form temporary arrangements only, and are without prejudice to the outcome of the comprehensive spending review.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what changes he proposes to make to regulations governing council tax enforcement, the levy of distress and houses in multiple occupation as a result of the consultation papers issued in September. [22013]

Ms Armstrong: I have today put a copy of a paper setting out our conclusions in response to the consultation exercise, and a list of all those that replied, in the House Library. Regulations will be laid before the House early in the New Year.

Construction Contracts

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends to bring into effect the provisions on construction contracts which are contained in Part II of the Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996. [22014]

Mr. Raynsford: I gave an assurance when we came into Government that I would implement the previous administration's legislation on fair construction contracts which had been introduced with cross-Party agreement. I am delighted now to be fulfilling that promise.

I have today laid an order which sets out the arrangements which need to be followed where construction contracts fail to contain adjudication and payment provisions which comply with the 1996 Act. I have also laid an order excluding certain types of contracts, and especially contracts under the Private Finance Initiative, from the terms of the Act.

These proposals are the result of detailed and comprehensive consultation with all sections of the construction industry. The adjudication provisions will help resolve construction disputes quickly and simply. I am looking to forward to the legislation coming into effect in the Spring.

Driving Licences

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about progress on including a photograph of the holder on driving licences. [22016]

Dr. Strang: The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency will introduce photocard style driving licences from next summer.

Sustainable Development

Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Government's response to the Government Panel on Sustainable Development's Third Annual Report will be published. [22017]

Mr. Prescott: The Government's response to the Third Annual Report of the Government Panel on Sustainable Development has been published today. I am pleased that we have been able to respond positively to many of the Panel's recommendations. The Panel is a valuable source of advice for Government in the achievement of sustainable development, an issue which this Government has pledged will be at the heart of all policy-making. I wish to express my gratitude to the Convenor of the Panel, Sir Crispin Tickell, and his colleagues for their continued commitment to helping to identify new sustainable ways of enhancing the quality of life and prosperity for everyone.

Examples where the Government has been able to respond positively to the Panel's recommendations are:

- on Subsidies: action is being taken to see whether the objectives of subsidies are compatible with sustainable development
- on Aviation Fuel: the Prime Minister pressed for action at the UN Special Session in June
- on Climate change: the Government has set the pace internationally on targets for reducing carbon dioxide emissions
- on Environmental Education: the Government has announced a new Environmental Education Panel, under the chairmanship of Sir Geoffrey Holland; commissioned the Council for Environmental Education to draft a code of good practice; and provided additional resources for the Environmental Action Fund on Housing and Land Use Planning: the Government is looking at ways of using fiscal incentives to meet environmental objectives.

I am placing copies of the response in the Library.

Environment Council

Mr. Leslie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Environment Council on 16 December. [22084]

Mr. Meacher: I and the Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle), represented the United Kingdom at the Environment Council on 16 December 1997.

The Council reached a common position on a regulation establishing common rules and procedures for the export of certain types of Community waste to certain non-OECD countries which will complete the regulatory regime controlling the export of non-hazardous waste to non-OECD countries.

The Council agreed conclusions on the Community's proposed strategy to combat acid rain. Ministers supported the Strategy in principle, but noted that the costs of the Commission's proposals were excessive and called for further work to be done to establish a sounder methodology. Conclusions were also agreed on the Community's Biodiversity Strategy, calling upon the Commission to produce the Strategy, which is required under the Biodiversity Strategy, by the end of January 1998.

In the discussion on the proposed directive to reduce emissions from light commercial vehicles, the Council reached a general understanding on the way forward, but the European Parliament's opinion is needed before Common Position can be reached. The Council also reached a broad measure of common understanding on the proposed Landfill Directive but again, a decision on a Common Position must await the European Parliament's opinion.

The Commission reported on progress on the Water Framework Directive and on environmental indicators and green national accounting. The Commission also made presentations on proposals for a directive to reduce emissions for heavy goods vehicles, a revised directive on the deliberate release of genetically modified organisms, and a communication on Environment and Employment.

Over lunch, Ministers discussed the EU's approach to climate change in light of the outcome of the recent Kyoto conference. There was broad agreement that more work needed to be done urgently in a number of areas, including sinks, the clean development mechanism and emissions trading in the run up to the next negotiating session. This will be a priority during the UK Presidency, as will work to finalise the burden sharing among Member States on the EU target and to take forward common and co-ordinated policies and measures. Brief discussions were also held on the Community mechanism for monitoring greenhouse gas emissions and on Community action needed to control CO_2 emissions from cars.

After the conclusion of business, as is customary for the incoming Chair of the Council. I thanked the Luxembourg minister and his team for their hard work during their Presidency. I announced that the environment would be one of the key themes of the UK's Presidency overall and that in the Environment Council, we would take forward work on climate change, including the proposals on a CO_2 monitoring mechanism and CO_2 from cars; continue the work on landfill, emissions from light vans, sulphur content of liquid fuels, the Solvents Directive, revision of Directives on Biotechnology and the Water Framework Directive; and start discussion of new proposals on the Air Quality Daughter Directive, a directive on emissions from heavy goods vehicles, the European Environment Agency regulation, the Zoos Recommendation and the EU Biodiversity Strategy. We would prepare the EU position on a number of international events, including the Commission on Sustainable Development, the fourth Conference of Parties to the Biodiversity Convention and the Environment for Europe Conference. Finally, I also announced that there would be a joint session of the Environment and Transport Councils on 17 June and an Informal Council on 24–26 April, again with a joint session of environment and transport ministers.

Lead Shot

Mr. Leslie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he plans to restrict the use of lead shot over wetlands. [22085]

Mr. Meacher: My Department is considering the best legislative options to prohibit the use of lead shot over wetlands in the United Kingdom. Legislation will be introduced as soon as Parliamentary time permits. This will enable the United Kingdom to meet its commitment under the African-Eurasian Waterbird Agreement to endeavour to phase out lead shot over wetlands by the year 2000. In the meantime the voluntary phase out of the use of lead shot over wetlands will continue.

Telecommunications Masts

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research his Department has commissioned into the possible health effects of telecommunication masts transmitting microwaves. [21250]

Ms Jowell: I have been asked to reply.

The Department has commissioned two studies on biological effects of microwaves as part of its Radiation Protection Research Programme. The first is investigating the influence of radiation on learning ability and behaviour. The other is a laboratory study looking for biological responses of human cells in an electromagnetic radiation field.

The Department is also contributing to the World Health Organisation International Electromagnetic Field Project which includes health effects of microwaves.

In addition, the Small Area Health Statistics Unit, on behalf of this and five other Government Departments, has investigated the incidence of leukaemia near 20 high power Television/FM transmitters in Great Britain. The study found that living close to a transmitter was not associated with an increased risk of leukaemia.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Smoking

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission when the Commission expects the House to become a non-smoking building. [21693]

Mr. Kirkwood: There are no current plans to designate any part of the Parliamentary Estate as a non-smoking building.

DEFENCE

Land Mines

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many land mines and anti-personnel mines have been destroyed through United Kingdom supported programmes since 1 May. [18959]

Dr. Reid: The Government provide financial and/or personnel support to a number of mine clearance programmes. Because some of these programmes are carried out by international organisations, the information requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Furthermore, the key measure used in such programmes is not the number of mines destroyed but the size of area cleared.

Aircraft

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the (a) first and (b) last deliveries were made of the (i) Jaguar, (ii) Tornado F3, (iii) Tornado GR1 and (iv) RAF Harrier; and what is the life expectancy of each aircraft type. [20078]

Dr. Reid: The information requested is shown in the table:

Aircraft	First delivery	Last delivery	Current planned out of service date
Jaguar	1973	1982	2008
Tornado F3	1986	1993	2010
Tornado GR1	1980	1992	[1]2006
Harrier	1969	[2]1995	2015

Note:
[1] Those Tornado GR1s which are being upgraded to GR4 will have an out of service date of 2018.
[2] The first Harrier delivered was a GR1, the last Harrier delivered was a T-10. The out of service date relates to GR7 aircraft.

The Out of Service dates of each aircraft type are kept under review and are subject to change.

Gibraltar

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in what circumstances NATO's Joint Sub-Regional Command (Madrid) wil be responsible for the operational command of Gibraltar; and if he will make a statement. [20475]

Dr. Reid: NATO's Joint Sub-Regional Commands, once implemented, will have no permanently established boundaries or areas of responsibility. Regional Commanders will be able to propose the establishment of areas of responsibility for particular Joint Sub-Regional Commands in specific contingencies or missions. Such proposals will require the approval of all NATO nations. The defence and security of Gibraltar are, and will remain, the direct responsibility of the United Kingdom.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence with which countries the DERA has been involved in collaborative research involving animals in the last 10 years. [20511]

Mr. Spellar: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA). I have asked the Chief Executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from J. Chisholm to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 18 December 1999:

As Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) I have been asked to reply to your question about which countries DERA has been involved with in collaborative research involving the use of animals over the past ten years.

DERA has been, and continues to be, involved in a large number of collaborative research programmes, a small number of which involve the use of animals by one or more of the partners. Information as to whether specific programmes include animal use is not collected centrally, and to look at agreements individually in order to identify those which involve animals would incur unreasonable costs.

However, in general terms, collaboration involving the exchange of data likely to have been generated from experiments involving animals occurs, or has occurred with the following countries—United States, Canada, New Zealand, Australia, France, Norway, Netherlands, Sweden and Germany.

I am sorry that I cannot be more helpful on this occasion.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the procedures which have been carried out on horses and (b) the number of horses involved in these procedures which have died as a result at (i) Porton Down and (ii) other establishments for which he is responsible in each of the last 10 years. [20468]

Mr. Spellar: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from J. Chisholm to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 18 December 1997:

As Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA), I have been asked to reply to your questions about procedures carried out on horses at Porton Down and elsewhere.

The numbers of procedures carried out on horses at the Chemical and Biological Defence (CBD) Sector at Porton Down in each of the last 10 years are reported as follows:

Year	Number of procedures
1987	7
1988	1
1989	0
1990	50
1991	46
1992	44
1993	16

Year	Number of procedures
1994	0

Between 1987 and 1993, a total of eight horses were used as blood donors for the supply of normal blood used in the preparation of media for microbiology. The horses were bled in rotation and only small volumes, relative to the size of the animals, were taken. The removal of a small volume of blood every few weeks caused no ill effects in the animals and no animals died as a result of these procedures.

As you can see from the figures above, the relationship between the numbers of procedures, animals used and deaths is not necessarily a simple extrapolation. Further, there have been changes in the reporting requirements of the Home Office. For example, when the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 was first introduced, it was agreed with the Home Office Inspectorate that multiple blood samples taken from a single horse would constitute one procedure. This changed in 1990, when a procedure was recorded each time a blood sample was taken.

There has been a continuing interest in the use of animals in defence research and the retrieval of information to answer this question has highlighted potential anomalies in the presentation and interpretation of statistics regarding animal experimentation. I refer to my replies to questions from Mr. Norman Baker MP and from yourself (Official Report Cols 174 and 172 dated 2 December 1997).

Specifically, in each case we presented the figures on animal experimentation as returned annually to the Home Office. However, there are differences in reporting requirements between the two Acts which have governed animal experimentation (the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876 and Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986), and a subsequent revision in 1990 to the 1986 Act has required that the figures recorded are the numbers of procedures conducted rather than the numbers of animals involved.

As a result, there are some inconsistencies in the statistics over the period of time in which these changes took place. In the majority of cases, the number of procedures conducted equates to the number of animals used. During the investigations into this matter we have discovered that the over reporting also relates to sheep and dog usage but unfortunately the available data has not been recorded in a suitable manner to allow a reliable breakdown of information to be produced. Nevertheless, the gross statistics which have been provided are substantially correct and represent the maximum experimentation figures.

Finally, as far as the Defence Animal Centre is concerned, I can confirm that no procedures have been carried out on horses (and hence there have been no deaths) over the past 10 years.

I hope this answers your questions and clarifies the position.

HMS Invincible

Mr. Bruce George: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how long HMS Invincible will remain in the Mediterranean. [21010]

Mr. George Robertson: The issue of UNSCOM access to Iraqi facilities is not yet resolved and we need to maintain vigilance. HMS Invincible and her detachment of RAF Harriers, together with the RFA Fort Victoria, will remain in the Mediterranean until further notice.

Smart Procurement

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the actions taken by the Procurement Executive to implement smart procurement measures. [21124]

Mr. Spellar: MOD is undertaking a fundamental and rigorous review of its procurement policies, procedures and practices. I have instituted wide consultation within MOD, well beyond the boundaries of the Procurement Executive, and also with Industry. Much work has already been done and I expect that formal recommendations will emerge early in the New Year. It will then be possible to outline the measures to be implemented.

Service Accommodation (Evictions)

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what provision is made for households evicted from armed forces' housing estates; and what liaison takes place with local authorities to ensure that families are properly re-housed locally with particular reference to those households whose head is (a) unemployed and (b) on income support. [21325]

Mr. Spellar: The responsibility for finding alternative accommodation and contacting Local Authorities rests with the individual concerned. However, MOD are sensitive to the needs of the individuals and, where necessary, provide advice and assistance in liaison with Local Authorities and completion of the necessary paperwork. In addition, the Joint Service Housing Advice Office (JSHAO), a tri-Service organisation, provides housing advice on all aspects of housing needs including renting through the council to personnel from any of the three services and their dependants, and also separated partners who are occupying Service families accommodation.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the 110 Series Land Rover has an exhaust emission which meets current EU regulations. [21148]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The Trucks Utility Medium (High Specification) (TUM(HS)) 110 Series vehicles currently on order from Land Rover fully comply with current EU regulations.

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 16 December 1997]: I am not aware of any representations concerning exhaust emissions of Army Land Rovers being received.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to extend the life of Series 3 Land Rovers. [21144]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 16 December 1997]: There are no plans to extend the in-service life of the Series 3 Land Rover.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) Series 3 and (b) 110 Land Rovers are currently mothballed. [21146]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 16 December 1997]: There are no Series 3 or 110 Land Rovers currently mothballed.

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many 110 Series Land Rovers have been ordered by the Army; and how many have been delivered. [21145]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 16 December 1997]: A total of 6,029 Series 110 vehicles designated as Trucks Utility Medium (High Specifications), TUM(HS) have been ordered from Land Rover. To date 2,565 have been delivered.

Meningitis

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps the Government have taken to raise public awareness of meningitis, with particular reference to the university student population in Scotland. [20748]

Mr. Galbraith: It is vital that public awareness of meningococcal meningitis is maintained. Although relatively uncommon in Scotland, the infection can have potentially serious consequences. Prompt diagnosis and appropriate treatment can be lifesaving. Young children are the group most likely to be affected, but recently there has been an increase in the number of cases in young adults. The Health Education Board for Scotland publication "Birth to Five", which is issued to all new mothers in Scotland, includes information and advice about meningitis. Relevant information, produced by the Meningitis Research Foundation and the National Meningitis Trust, is issued routinely to students. The Scottish Office Department of Health is keeping the situation under review, in consultation with Health Board Consultants in Public Health Medicine.

WALES

Unoccupied Homes

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the total number of unoccupied homes in Wales (i) on 1 April 1990 and (ii) at the latest date for which figures are available; and what proportion was owned by (a) local authorities, (b) central Government Departments, (c) the private sector, (d) housing associations and (e) others. [19941]

Mr. Win Griffiths: Complete information on the number of vacant dwellings is collected for local authority stock only. However, the available information on housing association stock and on homes owned by the Welsh Office is given below. Figures for homes owned by the Home Office and the Ministry of Defence in England and Wales were given in the reply by my hon. Friend the Minister for London and Construction to a question from the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper) on 20 November 1997, Official Report, column 304. These data are not readily available separately for Wales.

Primary Health Care

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has to increase the role of primary health care in Wales. [20726]

Mr. Win Griffiths: On 17 July I announced a comprehensive package of measures designed to promote primary and community health care in Wales. Some £2.5 million has been set aside for these proposals, which include:

- an Equity Fund of £500,000 to address inequalities in Primary Care an additional £500,000 investment in training and education in general practice
- £300,000 to implement pilot schemes under the Primary Care Act
- a Primary Care Development Fund of £250,000 to fund innovative projects
- £200,000 to promote the wider use of pharmacists
- a further £250,000 made available to attract more dentists into Wales
- £150,000 to train nurses and health visitors to prescribe certain drugs
- establishing a fraud unit to address the problem of prescription fraud.

The NHS (Primary Care) Act 1997 allows those who wish to have additional flexibility, the opportunity to pilot different models for providing primary care services. These pilots offer scope to test new ideas with a view to improving the services presently available.

I shall shortly be publishing a White Paper on replacing the NHS internal market in Wales and this will include further proposals for developing primary care. The draft health authority allocations [to be] published on 15 December shows that health authorities in Wales will receive a 5 per cent. real terms increase in their cash limited allocations for General Medical Services for next year.

Modern Apprenticeships

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the number of starts which will be allocated to each TEC in Wales for modern apprenticeships in 1998–99. [21025]

Mr. Hain: Programme provision allows for a total of 4,500 modern apprenticeship starts in Wales in 1998–99. Details of the allocation of these starts to individual TECs will not be available until contract negotiations between both the Welsh Office and the TECs and between the TECs and their training providers have been concluded.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate his Department has made of the number of starts allocated in 1996–97 to each TEC in Wales for modern apprenticeships; and what proportion of these starts had been used at the last available date. [21026]

Mr. Hain: The information requested is shown in the following table:

Modern apprenticeship starts 1996–97

However, total funding for Government programmes delivered through TECs (including the TEC Management Fee, Training for Work allowances and other central costs) will decrease from £118.1 million to £110.1 million (6.8 per cent.) between 1997–98 and 1998–99.

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the programmes for TECs in Wales which will receive a reduced allocation in 1998–99. [20984]

Mr. Hain: The information requested is as follows:

River Dee Bridge

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects the new River Dee bridge to be open to traffic; and if he will make a statement. [21242]

Mr. Hain: Flintshire County Council are responsible for this scheme. They now estimate the opening to take place in February–March.

Welfare to Work

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what expenditure under the welfare to work New Deal will be allocated to Wales in 1998–99. [20983]

Mr. Hain: The financial estimates relating to the New Deal for 1998–99 will not be finalised until the end of January so I am not able at this time to say exactly what the planned expenditure for Wales will be. I will write to my hon. Friend once the figure is known, and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Student Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many students are applying to university colleges in Wales for 1998 admission, broken down by constituencies in Wales. [21240]

Mr. Hain: Information on university applications is held centrally by the University and Colleges Admissions Services (UCAS). Entry data for 1998 is unavailable at present but would not be available on a constituency basis. UCAS intend issuing a statement on 19 December 1997.

Medical and Dental Students

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what will be the source of the funding for the special support covering tuition fees beyond year four for Welsh medical and dental students studying at a Scottish medical school. [20097]

Mr. Galbraith: I am replying on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales. It is the Government's intention that all eligible UK medical and dental students should benefit from the special provisions announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health on 23 September. The arrangements will be the subject of further discussions between the departments concerned.

Mr. Foulkes: The Indonesian authorities are aware of the international concern regarding the situation in Irian Jaya. Indonesian NGOs such as Indonesian Red Cross and Caritas Indonesia are actively participating in the relief process. The international donor community is also committed to alleviating the desperate plight of those affected, including improvements to the food distribution process.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development which non-governmental aid organisations have notified her Department that they are working in Irian Jaya. [21423]

Mr. Foulkes: We have been notified by World Vision, International Committee of the Red Cross and the United Nations Department for Humanitarian Affairs (UNDHA) of their activities in Irian Jaya. We have also contributed £75,000 to International Red Cross Committee's appeal for support to (i) assess the nutritional status of the Irianese and assisting with relief aid, (ii) evaluate hygiene conditions and improving access to safe drinking water through water and sanitation programmes and (iii) provide medical assistance. We are also expecting a proposal from World Vision, a well respected non-government organisation, which we are prepared to consider favourably.

North Korea

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what humanitarian aid the United Kingdom gives to North Korea. [21684]

[20346]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The most recent 12 month period for which Northern Ireland bull slaughter figures are available is for the 12 months ended 31 October 1997. During that period 14,375 bulls were slaughtered compared to 29,201 in the previous 12 month period.

There has been a decline in the number of bulls slaughtered in Northern Ireland due to the loss of export markets, following the introduction in March 1996 of the European Union's ban on the export of United Kingdom beef.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans she has to review the definitions of the words welfare and efficiency in the context of the legislation governing the role and activities of the Police Association for Northern Ireland. [20903]

Mr. Ingram: I have no immediate plans to review the definition of the words welfare and efficiency where they are used in the legislation relating to the representation of members of the RUC by the Police Association for Northern Ireland.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what monies or benefits in kind are provided from public funds to the Police Association for Northern Ireland. [20789]

Mr. Ingram: The Police Association for Northern Ireland comprises three sections. Grants made to each section by the Police Authority are set out below:

Police Federation for Northern Ireland

95 per cent. of salary costs of full time officials;

the cost of travel of full time officials; and 80 per cent. of the Police Federation's expenditure on the running costs of the Federation's Headquarters office accommodation.

The total grants in the current year will be in the order of £200,000.

Superintendents' Association for Northern Ireland

In the current year a grant of £6,500 has been made in respect of travel.

Association of Chief Police Officers

This year's payment to the association's National Secretariat has not yet been negotiated. Last year's was £23,000.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations the Police Authority for Northern Ireland has made to her about ensuring a neutral working environment in all RUC and Police Authority establishments in line with established fair employment legislation. [20906]

Mr. Ingram: The issue of a neutral working environment has been the subject of separate and composite representations from the Police Authority on several occasions in recent years. These have included presentation in March 1996 of a Consultation report "Everyone's Police—A Partnership for Change", correspondence and discussions with the last Secretary of State and Minister of State during 1996 and coverage within the Annual Report of the Police Authority which was presented to the Secretary of State in June 1997.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions she has had with the Chairman of the Police Federation for Northern Ireland concerning the importance of retaining public confidence in the RUC in its dealings with the entire community in Northern Ireland. [20792]

Mr. Ingram: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met the Chairman and Secretary of the Police Federation for Northern Ireland on Wednesday 10 December, to discuss a number of matters connected with policing arrangements in Northern Ireland. My hon. Friend also attended the Federation Conference in June.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the attendance record of each member of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland from July 1997 to date at (a) regular monthly authority meetings, (b) special authority meetings, (c) meetings of each sub-committee and (d) visits to authority and RUC establishments. [20762]

[1] Committee meetings are meetings of the Authority's Policy Co-ordinating Committee, General Purposes Committee, Support Services Committee, Community Relations Committee, Finance and Personnel Committee and Audit Committee.

[2] These visits were undertaken by the Authority's Support Services Committee.

[3] Authority Member whose name is not in the public domain.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many times the Police Authority for Northern Ireland's working group on public accountability and communication with the public has met since its appointment in April 1996; when its work will be complete; and if its findings will be published. [20756]

Mr. Ingram: The Authority's Working Group on Openness and Accountability met on six occasions between 24 April 1996 and its final meeting on 28 November 1996. The Working Group's recommendations were considered by the Authority during its meeting in December 1996 and, on 8 April 1997, two codes of practice were published and a press conference was held.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what matters have been investigated in the operations of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland following the suspension of a senior official in 1996; and what steps have been taken (a) in respect of that official and (b) in other respects arising from the investigation. [20765]

Mr. Ingram: Procedures relating to the letting of contracts, the proper maintenance of appropriate documentation and adherence to proper procedures were investigated. The senior official concerned was suspended on full pay pending investigation and the matter dealt with through the Disciplinary Code. A subsequent appeal, by the senior official, against disciplinary action was upheld. Purchasing and approval procedures have been thoroughly revised and are now being applied.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the interests declared and registered by members of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland. [20755]

One Member of the Authority, whose name is not in the public domain, has been given an exemption under Paragraph 14 of the Authority's Code of Conduct from listing his/her interests.

Union Flag (Police Stations)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will request the Police Authority and Chief Constable to review the list of days and occasions when the Union flag is flown over police stations. [20763]

Mr. Ingram: The flying of the Union Flag over police stations in Northern Ireland is a matter to be dealt with by the Chief Constable.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations the Police Authority for Northern Ireland has made to her about the list of days and occasions when the Union Flag is flown over police stations. [20908]

Mr. Ingram: The Police Authority for Northern Ireland presented its annual report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in June 1997; this included details of the Authority's views on the flying of the Union Flag over police stations. The matter was also discussed with the Authority at a meeting on 15 October 1997.

Students (Second Degrees)

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the support her Department will make available to students who chose medicine or dentistry as a second degree. [20777]

Mr. Worthington: A student who has already been on a course for which he has received support from public funds is precluded under the provisions of the Students' Regulations (Northern Ireland) from receiving an award to undertake a second first degree course in medicine, dentistry or any other subject. Such a student is eligible, however, to apply for a student loan towards his living costs. These rules will continue to apply to new students in 1998–99.

Schools

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals DENI has for further research on aspects of the Coopers and Lybrand report. [21231]

Mr. Worthington: The question of any further research on the issues raised in the Coopers and Lybrand Report on LMS formula funding will be considered further now that the interim proposals for 1998–99 have been finalised.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is DENI's timetable for the implementation of full commonality in the LMS formula. [21228]

Mr. Worthington: The timetable for the implementation of full commonality in LMS funding formulae will be determined following further consultation and discussion with interested parties.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many full-time, non-teaching employees of the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (a) there are currently and (b) there were in 1993–94. [21267]

Mr. Worthington: The information is as follows:

	Number
Currently employed	48
Employed in 1993–94	34

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment she has made of the (a) Coopers and Lybrand report proposal that the social deprivation factor in the LMS formula should quantify objectively the extra costs likely to be incurred by schools in educating pupils from socially deprived backgrounds and (b) the cost per pupil of that proposal. [21230]

Mr. Worthington: No detailed assessment has yet been made of the Coopers and Lybrand proposals relating to social deprivation. Part of that assessment will be the availability of working criteria for the inter-related factor of educational need.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals she has to introduce arrangements by which the views of controlled schools can be represented to her and to the DENI analogous to the arrangements available to the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools. [21308]

Mr. Worthington: Adequate arrangements are already in place to ensure that the views of schools of all types can be represented to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and to the Department of Education in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many principals and vice-principals of maintained schools who took early retirement from teaching, are currently employed, full-time or part-time by the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools. [21269]

Mr. Worthington: Two former principals who took early retirement are currently employed on a full-time basis by the Council.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the perceived religious affiliations of non-teaching employees of the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools were last monitored by the FEC. [21266]

Mr. Ingram: In common with all other specified Public Authorities the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools (CCMS) is required to monitor the religious composition of its workforce on an annual basis. The CCMS last monitored the perceived community background of its non-teaching employees on 1 January 1997. This information will be publishing in March 1998.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the perceived religious affiliations of present, non-teaching employees, of the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools. [21268]

Mr. Ingram: The latest published monitoring information is contained in the FEC's Seventh Annual Monitoring Report (March 1997). That document shows that at 1 January 1996, the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools had 40 employees of whom less than 10 were determined as being from the Protestant community.

Museums and Galleries

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what account her Department took of the Museums Association Code of Practice for Museum Governing Bodies in the preparation of the draft Museums and Galleries (NI) Order 1997. [21134]

Mr. Worthington [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The Department took into account the comments received from the Museums Association on the proposal for a draft Order. Its comments would obviously reflect its code of practice.

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in relation to the draft Museums and Galleries (NI) Order 1997, what representations were received from the Museums and Galleries Commission on the subject of powers to override trusts or conditions which prohibit or restrict the disposal of objects donated to museums and galleries. [21132]

Mr. Worthington [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The Museums and Galleries Commission (MGC) expressed concern that the powers of disposal contained within the first draft Order which was published in March 1997 were too wide-ranging and suggested wording similar to that used in Scottish legislation.

These views were taken into account in framing the revised draft which was laid on 25 November 1997 and which restricted the circumstances in which disposal could be considered.

On the day the draft Order was considered by Parliament, the Government received a letter from MGC expressing the view that although the revised draft represented overall a considerable improvement, they considered that the revised wording allowed scope for disposal beyond what they considered appropriate.

Mr. MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what account her Department took of the guidance in the Department of National Heritage Review of Museum Policy in the preparation of the draft Museums and Galleries (NI) Order 1997. [21135]

Mr. Worthington [holding answer 16 December 1997]: As the policy document "Treasures in Trust" was essentially an English document relating to English museums, it was not taken into account in detail by the previous Government when it proposed the draft Order. However, account was taken of many of the general principles expressed, where appropriate.

Public Order Offences

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people have been charged in relation to public order offences arising from incidents at (a) Portadown Town Centre, (b) Drumcree Church, (c) Brownstown Road, Portadown and (d) Garvaghy Road, Portadown, in each of the last five years. [20071]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The information is not available in the format requested and would incur disproportionate costs to provide.

NHS Staff

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many vacant positions there were in each of the last five years for (a) hospital doctors, (b) general practitioners and (c) nurses. [21360]

Mr. Worthington: The information is not held centrally in respect of hospital doctors and nurses. The following table shows the number of general medical practitioner vacancies in each of the last five years, all of which were filled.

	Vacancies
1993	59
1994	52
1995	59
1996	40
1997	49

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the projected shortfall for (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99 for (i) hospital doctors, (ii) general practitioners and (iii) nurses. [21361]

Mr. Worthington: Sufficient numbers of suitably qualified staff are available or in training to meet the projected needs of HSS Trusts and General Practice. There is therefore no expected shortfall.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will estimate the number of staffed acute beds in use for each of the last 10 years. [21405]

Mr. Worthington: The following table details the average number of beds which were available in wards open overnight in the Acute Services Programme of Care in Northern Ireland.

	Average number
1987	6,409
1988–89	6,107
1989–90	5,849

1992–93	5,281
1993–94	5,040
1994–95	4,813
1995–96	4,692

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Beef

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give a breakdown of the country of origin of beef imports in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [20256]

Mr. Rooker: UK beef imports for the period September 1996 to August 1997 as recorded in the Overseas Trade Statistics are shown in the table. For trade within the European Community, it is not possible to give a breakdown by country of origin. Instead data are shown by the country from which the goods were despatched.

[1] Some trade may originate from outside the European Community. All data is provisional and subject to amendment.

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action he will take to ensure that beef which is being imported from Europe is (a) free of BSE and (b) from a herd with no history of BSE. [21583]

Mr. Rooker: Animals showing clinical signs of BSE would not be slaughtered for human consumption in the European Union. Animals which might be incubating the disease at a stage too early to show clinical signs could be slaughtered for human consumption which is why the Government have extended their controls to ensure that the specified risk material is removed from imported beef from 1 January 1998.

The United Kingdom Government do not have a policy of banning beef from the domestic market from herds which have a case of BSE in the United Kingdom and there is therefore no basis on which we could apply standards to imports which we did not regard as necessary for our domestic production.

Vitamin and Mineral Supplements

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to review the safety of vitamin and mineral supplements; and if he will make a statement. [21660]

Mr. Rooker: The Government are concerned about the potential adverse effects of high-dose vitamin and mineral supplements. In view of these concerns, the Minister for Public Health and I have agreed that an ad hoc Expert Group should be established to consider the general principles on which maximum levels of vitamins and minerals in supplements sold under food law could be set.

The Expert Group will review the available science, and recommend maximum levels for a range of nutrients if appropriate. The Expert Group may also wish to provide advice on the addition of vitamins and minerals to foods. It will report to the Food Advisory Committee (FAC) which will consider the Group's findings and make recommendations to Ministers. The Committee on Safety in Medicines (CSM) will also wish to consider the Report as it may have implications for the way that medicinal products containing vitamins and minerals are licensed. The conclusions of the review will also be used to inform any discussions in Brussels on the possible harmonisation of controls on food supplements and on fortified foods.

The Expert Group will comprise of a number of experts from the Committee on Medical Aspects of Food and Nutrition Policy (COMA); the Committee on Toxicity of Chemicals in Food, Consumer Products and the Environment (COT); CSM and FAC.

In order to ensure transparency in the process, an observer from each of the main interest groups—the health food industry, the food industry, complementary medicine interests and consumer organisations—will be invited to meetings of the Expert Group. Interested parties will also be given the opportunity to make written submissions to the Expert Group. It is expected that the expert Group will take 18 months to two years to complete its task.

The establishment of this Expert Group will not affect the decision to introduce legislation to control the maximum level of vitamin B6 allowed in dietary supplements.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Brussels on 15 to 16 December; and if he will make a statement. [21662]

Dr. John Cunningham: I represented the United Kingdom at the meeting of the European Union Council of Agriculture Ministers in Brussels on 15 and 16 December. I was accompanied by my noble friend, the Lord Donoughue, Parliamentary Secretary responsible for farming and the food industry.

I informed my Ministerial colleagues of developments in relation to BSE, in particular my decision to ban from 1 January 1998 the import into the United Kingdom of meat from which the specified risk material had not been removed. This decision had been taken in the light of the postponement for three months of an EU-wide ban on such material. I also informed the Council of the prohibition which I had announced on 3 December in relation to the marketing of bone-in beef in the light of the scientific evidence which I had received from SEAC.

The Council considered and reached agreement on two animal welfare measures: one attaching welfare conditions to the payment of export refunds, which was adopted unanimously, the other laying down standards for vehicles used for the transport of animals. The latter was agreed in principle by qualified majority, with my Swedish and Danish colleagues and I unable to support the measure on the grounds that the standards of animal protection would be insufficiently high, and difficult to police. Detailed texts implementing this agreement will be considered early in the United Kingdom Presidency.

The Council discussed at some length a Commission report on the impact of third country trade agreements on the EU's Mediterranean producers. I insisted that, in drawing conclusions on this matter, the Council should have available to it an assessment of the trade benefits of such agreements to the EU as well as the impact on EU producers. The Council also considered a report from the Commission on progress in the negotiations on a veterinary equivalence agreement with the US. It noted that, although the conditions were not yet right for concluding that agreement, the Commission should continue its negotiations with a view to reaching a satisfactory conclusion as soon as possible in the new year.

Amongst other matters discussed and agreed at the Council were measures on the granting of national aid to sugar beet producers in Portugal (Italy voting against); and extension of the temporary derogations for imports of wine from the US (Portugal voting against); rules governing veterinary checks on products entering the EU from third countries (by unanimity); and a proposal consolidating the drinking milk regulation (Greece and Denmark voting against).

The Irish Minister raised in the Council his Government's concerns over the recent interruptions to trade between the UK and the Republic of Ireland as a result of UK farmers' protests at ports; but he emphasised the close co-operation which exists between the two Governments in seeking to resolve this matter. I stressed the absolute commitment of the Government to maintaining the rule of law, and our intention to do everything necessary to allow the unimpeded movement of goods within the EU single market.

CJD

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the percentage risk of contracting CJD from consuming 1kg of beef on-the-bone sourced from cattle born after 1 August 1996; and if he will make a statement. [21597]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the advice given to the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) on 16 December 1997, Official Report, column 134.

The risk assessments undertaken by SEAC relate to consumption in 1998 which would primarily be from beef born before 1 August 1996. The risk in later years would decline with the expectation that the incidence of disease in British cattle would continue to decline.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department's estimates of the total costs of resolving the millennium compliance problem include costs relating to the embedded chip problem; and if he will make a statement. [21565]

Mr. Morley: I can confirm that the Department's latest estimate of the total cost of resolving the millennium compliance problem amounts to £11.1 million, of which £4.1 million relates to the embedded chip problem.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what millennium compliance problems have occurred to date in his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) other public bodies; and if he will make a statement. [21560]

Mr. Morley: Problems encountered when preparing for the millennium include those of a general nature, such as clearly defining the scope of the Department's (including Agency) millennium programme/project(s), as well as resourcing and prioritisation issues. Lower-level problems have been encountered in obtaining required assurances from suppliers of systems/products, identifying risks and required contingency actions (including identifying replacement suppliers/products where necessary). With regard to IT application systems, though the millennium is still two years away, some problems have already appeared—for example problems have been identified (and addressed) on a computer system which is concerned with processing five-year forward-looking agreements, where the termination date falls in the new millennium. Non-Departmental Public Bodies sponsored by the Department do not fall directly within the scope of the Department's millennium programme, but all relevant bodies have been asked to progress essential preparations.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Locate in Scotland

17. Mr. Canavan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent communications her Department has had with Locate in Scotland on inward investment issues. [19885]

Mr. Ian McCartney: My officials and those at Locate in Scotland are in regular contact on inward investment issues and they continue to work in partnership under the Committee on Overseas Promotion arrangements.

Regional Development Agencies

18. Mrs. Ellman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps she is taking to ensure that her Department's responsibilities are co-ordinated with the proposed regional development agencies. [19886]

Mr. Ian McCartney: As set out in the White Paper "Building Partnerships for Prosperity"—which has received a warm welcome since it was published at the beginning of the month—regional development agencies will work very closely with my Department on a wide range of activities. Last week, the Government presented to the House a Bill for establishing these agencies. My Department is now working on detailed arrangements for ensuring that these agencies are up and running on 1 April 1999, supporting and enhancing DTI work in ways which meet regional needs.

Late Payment

19. Mr. Quinn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on establishing a statutory right to interest on the late payment of debt. [19887]

Mrs. Roche: I am delighted to say that the Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Bill was introduced in the other place on 10 December and published the next day. We expect the second Reading to take place on Monday 12 January.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will place in the Library copies of all the responses to the Green Paper on "Improving the Payment Culture". [21129]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 16 December 1997]: A schedule of all responses received, except those where the author specifically requested that their response not be published, was placed in the Library of the House upon publication of the Bill, on Thursday 11 December 1997. The full responses were, in accordance with current guidelines from the Library of the House, placed in the DTI library.

The House Library will be able to obtain copies of these responses from the DTI's library on request.

RJB Mining plc

20. Mr. Baldry: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when she last met the chairman of RJB Mining plc. [19888]

Mr. Battle: As the Minister responsible for energy matters, I have met with the Chairman and Executives of RJB Mining plc on a number of occasions and will continue to do so as I see necessary. I last formally met Mr. Budge on Thursday 11 December. My officials maintain close contact with the company also.

High Technology Companies

21. Dr. Starkey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans she has to assist high technology companies to expand their businesses. [19890]

Mrs. Roche: The Government are determined to create an environment in which high technology companies can develop and grow. This includes improving the climate for investment, helping firms to access and adapt new technologies, and encouraging partnerships between the science and engineering base and industry. The DTI has already announced a number of new activities in these areas, including, for example:

support for the UK Business Incubator Centre;

setting up a Steering Group on Tech-Stars; and establishing the enterprise Zone Internet site.

Barclays Bank

22. Mr. Khabra: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations she has received on the current dispute between Barclays bank and its staff; and if she will make a statement. [19891]

28. Mr. Moran: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations she has received on the current dispute between Barclays bank and its staff. [19898]

Mr. Ian McCartney: My Department has received a number of representations about this dispute. These have included representations from the Banking Insurance and Finance Union, UN/FI, a member of Barclays bank staff and Members of this House. ACAS stands ready to assist but can only become involved if both sides agrees.

27. Mr. Coleman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will invite the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service to use its conciliation services in the Barclays bank dispute. [19897]

Mr. Ian McCartney: ACAS is an independent body and the Government cannot and should not direct it to act in any particular way. ACAS of course stands ready to assist but can become involved in talks only where both sides agree.

Mr. Khabra: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will request ACAS to invite Barclays Bank and the unions representing Barclays staff to use its conciliation services to help resolve the current dispute; and if she will make a statement. [19799]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) on 9 December 1997, Official Report, column 529.

Low Pay Commission

23. Mr. Hanson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement about the work of the Low Pay Commission. [19892]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Low Pay Commission is well advanced on its programme of consultation to obtain views of employers, employees and other interested organisations and individuals on the National Minimum Wage. The Commission is also undertaking a series of visits throughout the UK to obtain local views. I understand they will visit Wales on 9 January 1998.

Inward Investment

24. Mr. Evans: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what measures she is taking to ensure the spread of inward investment benefits throughout England. [19893]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Location decisions for inward investment are a matter for the commercial judgment of each inward investor, but all the agencies in England, as elsewhere in the UK, are active in promoting the particular attractions of their regions. New supply chain opportunities generated by inward investment projects often cut across regional boundaries thus widening the benefits beyond any single region.

Research Organisations

25. Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what measures her Department is taking to improve communication between business and research base organisations. [19894]

Mr. Battle: One of the key aims of the Government is to maximise the benefits from our research base, whose excellence is widely recognised.

We have already made a number of announcements since the election demonstrating our commitment in this area, for example the establishment of four new Faraday Partnerships, the extension of TCS (the Teaching Company Scheme) and the Foresight LINK Awards.

The President of the Board of Trade has also instituted the President's Partnership Prize as an accolade to those universities who have achieved high levels of success in applying the results of their research to commercial problems.

I am considering, as part of the Department's Comprehensive Spending Review, what more can be done to improve interaction between business and the science, engineering and technology base.

Industrial Enterprises

26. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total sum spent on the production and development of industrial enterprises in the most recent year for which figures are available. [19896]

Mrs. Roche: A breakdown of RSA grant offered to foreign and domestic enterprises by region is published each year in the Industrial Development Act 1982 Annual Report, a copy of which is available in the library of the House.

Competitiveness

29. Mrs. Dean: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what measures she has taken to improve the competitiveness of British companies. [19899]

Mrs. Beckett: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Liz Blackman).

Liz Blackman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps she is taking to improve the competitiveness of British industry. [19876]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is pushing forward her Competitiveness UK initiative. On 11 November, she published "A Benchmark for Business", an examination of our competitiveness at both national and sectoral level.

My right hon. Friend has announced the creation of six industry-based Working Parties to advise her on how business and Government can improve UK performance. The work of these groups and of my right hon. Friend's Advisory Group on Competitiveness will lead to a Competitiveness White Paper next year.

31. Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what measures she has taken to improve the competitiveness of small and medium businesses. [19902]

Mrs. Roche: Small firms form the bedrock of a successful enterprise culture. The sector is crucial to the UK's competitiveness and lies at the heart of the Government's economic strategy.

We have already taken a number of steps to stimulate and sustain the competitiveness of small businesses. Measures include raising the quality of business support provided by Business Links to the standard of the best; launch of the Enterprise Zone as the definitive Internet site for guiding small businesses to the most appropriate authoritative business-related information; and the bringing forward of a package of measures to promote a better payment culture.

We also want future policies and priorities to be informed by business. SMEs are therefore an important element of the process of consultation and dialogue under the Department's "Competitiveness" initiative.

Minimum Wage

30. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent representations she has received on minimum wage proposals. [19901]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Government have received a number of representations on our plans to introduce a national minimum wage.

35. Mr. Paterson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on exemptions to the national minimum wage. [19906]

Mr. Ian McCartney: We plan to introduce a national minimum wage which does not differentiate by area, sector of employment, size of undertaking or by occupation. The Low Pay Commission has been asked to make recommendations about the possibility of exempting or applying a different rate to those aged under 26.

Carbon Emissions

32. Mr. Stunell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment she has made of the impact of freezing approvals for gas-powered electricity generation plant on achieving the Government's target of 20 per cent. reductions in carbon emissions by 2010. [19903]

Mr. Battle: Any such assessment has to await the outcome of the Kyoto Conference, and detailed proposals for implementation of targets agreed internationally and, of the Review itself.

Trade Contracts

33. Mr. Baker: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what account she takes of environmental aspects when pursuing trade contracts. [19904]

Mrs. Roche: The Department ensures that environmental considerations are take into account in assessing applications from companies for support in pursuing overseas contracts.

Energy (Single Market)

34. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on progress in developing a single market in energy in the European Community. [19905]

Mr. Battle: Directive 96/92 concerning common rules for the internal market in electricity entered into force in February this year and must be implemented by the majority of Member States by February 1999. This Directive requires Member States to introduce competition in electricity generation and allow at least 25 per cent. of their market to seek alternative suppliers of electricity as a first stage, rising to around one third of the market by 2003.

Political agreement was reached at the Energy Council on 8 December on the Gas Liberalisation Directive.

GEC-Alsthom

Mr. Kidney: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on her Department's role on the flotation of GEC Alsthom. [19884]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: While the flotation of GEC-Alsthom is a matter for the two shareholding companies, we want to see it continue as a successful world player in power generation, power transmission, and rail transportation with a substantial presence in the UK.

Biotechnology

Ms Whalley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans she has for public consultation in respect of the proposed European Biotechnology Patent Directive. [17804]

Mr. Battle: Information concerning the Commission's proposal was circulated widely, including by use of the Internet. As a result, over 150 organisations made their views known to me or my Department and took part in a consultation exercise. Organisations included those representing environmental interests, health and patient groups, animal welfare, the professions, industry, trade unions and religious groups.

The debate which surrounded the European Commission's proposal for a Directive on the legal protection of biotechnological inventions highlighted a number of ethical issues which surrounded this technology. Therefore, I announced on 24 November 1997, Official Report, column 412, that my Department would be sponsoring a consultation initiative to seek public views on biological research.

My ultimate goal is to engage members of the public in debate to enable us to assess the issues that are of wider concern. However, I feel that an important pre-cursor to this is to involve interested parties active in the debate to add to the credibility that an inclusive approach will offer.

I shall be hosting an event in the New Year to discuss with groups active in the biosciences and science communication how we can best develop the public activity, which is planned for next summer.

Dr. Kumar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Government plans to respond to the 5th Report of the Science and Technology Committee of Session 1996–97 (HC 373), on the Cloning of Animals from Adult Cells; and if she will make a statement. [22105]

Mrs. Beckett: I welcome the careful consideration which the committee gave the issues raised following the announcement of the successful cloning of "Dolly" from adult sheep cells. The Government's response emphasises that the Government will strive to ensure that the debate on the ethical issues surrounding biosciences keeps pace with advances in these technologies, both at national and international level. The Government's response has been published today and copies are available in the Libraries of both Houses.

Gas-fired Power Stations

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on the Government's policy in respect of consents for further gas-fired power stations. [17952]

Mrs. Beckett: It was announced on 3 December that I propose to defer decisions on outstanding applications until the work of the Review announced on that day has been completed.

Defective Products

Sir Richard Body: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what cost analysis has been undertaken on European Council document COM (97) 478 on the approximation of laws for defective products; and what domestic legislation this document will entail. [18477]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: An initial consultation of farming interests by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (MAFF) suggests that the main costs to agriculture producers will be those associated with insuring against potential product liability claims, and may be fairly low. MAFF will shortly be carrying out a full consultation on the likely costs to the industry.

If adopted, the proposed amendment to the 1985 Product Liability Directive would most likely be implemented in the United Kingdom by regulations under the European Communities Act 1972 amending Part I of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 (which implements the 1985 Directive). The 1985 Directive was implemented in Northern Ireland by the Consumer Protection (Northern Ireland) Order 1987.

Export Credits

Dr. Tonge: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of the (a) claims and (b) recoveries on ECGD business were attributable to exports and defence related equipment for the financial years (i) 1992–93, (ii) 1993–94, (iii) 1994–95, (iv) 1995–96 and (v) 1996–97. [19746]

Mrs. Roche: From readily available information, the following figures have been extracted:

Per cent.

	Claims	Recoveries
1992–93	10.97	6.86
1993–94	13.78	2.36
1994–95	31.62	2.68
1995–96	36.41	4.34
1996–97	20.98	1.89

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps she has taken to establish the (i) status and (ii) costs of millennium compliance for (a) the European Commission and (b) the European Parliament. [19195]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 4 December 1997]: The UK Government take the issue of millennium compliance extremely seriously, which is why at the Telecommunications Council meeting on 1 December I drew attention to the need for analysis and preparation both within the public and private sectors. However, the particular matter raised here is one for the European Commission and the European Parliament.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate she has made of the number of computer professionals needed to solve the year 2000 computer compliance problem for the SME sector; how many she estimates are currently available; and if she will make a statement. [19262]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 8 December 1997]: The Government have made no estimate. Some industry specialists estimate that between 30,000 to 50,000 additional skilled IT staff will be required. Action 2000, the Government's new initiative to help businesses tackle the century date problem, will be supporting programmes to address this issue.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Cotter: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what the cost has been of the enterprise zone system which provides information on the Internet for small firms. [19581]

Mrs. Roche: The cost of developing and launching the first phase of the Enterprise Zone, which went live on 4 November, was £46,000. A maximum budget of £200,000 has been allocated from existing resources for the present financial year to cover the costs of further development, and of maintaining and publicising the site.

Export Licences

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when her Department will publish the results of its consultation on export licences. [20036]

Mrs. Roche: As my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade stated on 5 June 1997, Official Report, column 236, copies of the responses to the consultation document on strategic export controls (with the exception of two for which confidentiality was requested), were placed in the libraries of both Houses in February of this year as well as the library of the DTI, where members of the public could arrange to see them. In the same statement, the President of the Board of Trade announced that copies of these responses would henceforth also be available on request from the Department's Export Control Organisation.

We have since been considering the responses carefully as part of the DTI-led review of strategic export controls and expect to set out our proposals during the current parliamentary session.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will provide details of the export licences (a) granted since 1988 and (b) pending for the export of tear gas and plastic baton rounds to Kenya. [20054]

Mrs. Roche: These goods, and others, are controlled under different entries in Part 1 of Schedule III to the Export of Goods (Control) Order which are known as the ratings for these goods: tear gas under entry ML7; and plastic baton rounds under entries ML3 or PL5018.

The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated, and the following results were obtained.

As of 9 December 1997, 61 standard individual export licences are recorded as having been issued since 1 January 1991 for the export to Kenya of goods with these ratings. Since 1 January 1994, no Open Individual Export Licences (OIELs) have been issued for the export to Kenya of such goods.

Number of standard individual export licences covering the export to Kenya of goods with this rating

Rating	Number
ML7	0
ML3	49
PL5018	12

However, this information should be considered in light of the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), on 30 October 1997, Official Report, columns 870–71.

It would entail disproportionate cost to determine which, if any, of the licences on which data are set out in the table covered the specified goods. Similarly, information on any standard individual export licences and/or OIELs for the export to Kenya of the specified goods that may have been issued before these dates could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

In addition, goods with the relevant ratings may have been exported to Kenya under the following Open General Export licences: OGEL (export after repair: military goods) and OGEL (export after exhibition: military goods), both of which were first issued on 1 March 1994.

As of 21 November 1997, two applications for standard individual export licences for the export of Kenya of goods with one or more of the relevant ratings were awaiting a decision and none for Open Individual Export Licences with this coverage.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will provide details of export licences granted to Sound Day Corporation for the export of anti-riot equipment, tear gas canisters and plastic baton rounds to Kenya since 1988. [20055]

Mrs. Roche: The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated, and the following results were obtained.

As of 12 December 1997, no standard individual export licences are recorded as having been issued to Sound Day Corporation since 1 January 1991; and no Open Individual Export Licences (OIELs) have been issued to this company since 1 January 1994.

However, this information should be considered in light of the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), 30 October 1997, Official Report, columns 870–71.

Information on any standard individual export licences and/or OIELs that may have been issued to this company before these dates could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

India Desk

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many staff there are on her Department's India Desk. [20946]

Mrs. Roche: Currently 13 people are allocated to the India Desk.

Investment

Mr. Swinney: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on the Government's policy on the multilateral agreement on investment. [20704]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The Government support the general aims of the proposed MAI and are working to achieve a successful outcome to the negotiations by next April. We are aiming for a comprehensive, multilateral and legally binding agreement providing high standards of investment protection and liberalisation of investment regimes, based on the principle of non-discrimination against foreign investors, and with effective dispute settlement procedures. This Government have pressed for the MAI to take account of environmental and labour concerns.

Steel Industry

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the Government's forecast of changes in employment levels in the British steel industry over the next year. [20893]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: This is a diverse industry with many companies, the great majority of which do not themselves publish predictions about future employment. In these circumstances, the Government make no such forecast. Indeed, no Government have ever produced forecasts of levels of employment in the private sector.

Post Office

Mr. Laxton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what were the number of crown post offices, the types and numbers of other main offices, the number of sub post offices, the number of crown offices closed and the number of closed offices converted into each type of other main office or sub post office in each year since 1989. [21270]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I understand from the Post Office that the numbers are as follows:

Year to end March	Crown offices	Company franchise post offices	Independent franchise post offices	Modified sub post offices	Other sub post offices
1989	1,493	0	0	0	19,537
1990	1,339	0	0	153	19,379
1991	1,167	3	0	315	19,153
1992	1,019	28	0	438	18,675
1993	917	78	0	498	18,465
1994	800	120	0	576	18,286
1995	699	164	0	646	18,098
1996	653	190	0	677	17,894
1997	606	209	25	686	17,725

Toys

Kate Hoey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade by what procedures her Department ensures that the grants which they award to small toy producers to exhibit at trade fairs are spent completely in the interests of the recipient by the British Toy and Hobby Association. [21264]

Mrs. Roche: Grants are paid to the British Toy and Hobby Association, and to other intermediaries, on receipt of a signed claim listing the names of the eligible firms in their group and the amounts owing. We seek confirmation from intermediaries' auditors once a year that all their claims are in order and that moneys have been passed on to eligible firms. We also audit a random sample of events to check that intermediaries like the BTHA have discharged all their obligations to the Department.

Telephone Fraud

Mr. Oaten: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many complaints concerning telephone fraud her Department has received in each of the last three years. [20965]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 16 December 1997]: From readily available records, I can state that my Department received one complaint concerning telephone fraud in 1995, five complaints in 1996 and two complaints in 1997.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will establish a public inquiry into domestic telephone fraud. [20966]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Oftel has over the past year carried out detailed investigations with BT into complaints of organised network fraud on telephone services. Oftel is continuing its investigations but has no evidence of organised network fraud. I am confident that Oftel take network security issues very seriously. My Department therefore has no plans at present to establish a public inquiry into domestic telephone fraud.

Working Time Directive

Dr. Kumar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade by which date she expects to enact the European Working Time Directive. [21387]

Mr. Ian McCartney: We shall implement the Directive without any avoidable delay.

Businesses (Assisted Areas)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many businesses have moved from unassisted to assisted areas in the last three years; and what figures she has collated in respect of the Chorley constituency. [21496]

Mrs. Roche: There are no data available on the number of businesses moving form unassisted to assisted areas.

The Government does, however, publish a wide range of data on financial assistance to companies in assisted areas in the Industrial Development Act 1982 Annual Report. This information is presented to Parliament pursuant to sections 11 and 15 of the Industrial Development Act 1982. Copies of the reports for the last three years are available in the Library of the House.

Opencast Mines

Mr. Cox: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many open castmines currently operate in the United Kingdom. [21389]

Mr. Battle: At the end of November 1997, there were 84 producing opencast coal sites in the United Kingdom.

Gulf States (Visits)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans she has to visit (a) Abu Dhabi, (b) Dubai and (c) Oman. [21859]

Mrs. Roche: None at present, but the DTI Ministerial overseas visits programme is constantly under review.

Launch Aid

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on Launch Aid. [19889]

Mr. Battle: The Government will continue to assess any application for launch aid on its individual merits. As I said when I announced the Government's investment in Rolls-Royce's Trent engine programme, consideration of future applications for this kind of support for the civil aviation industry will be informed by our commitment to public/private sector partnerships.

The Government currently receive receipts from the aerospace industry from past launch aid of more than £100 million a year. The investment in Rolls-Royce Trent engine programme should, if successful as I fully expect, yield a commercial rate of return to the country.

Plutonium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to the Answer to the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker) of 2 December 1997, Official Report, columns 163–64, if she will arrange for the Report on the Guidelines for the Management of Civil Plutonium to be placed on the Department's internet site. [21674]

Mr. Battle: I have arranged for the Guidelines for the Management of Civil Plutonium, as applicable to the UK, to be placed on the Department of Trade and Industry's Internet site at http://www.dti.gov.uk.

Energy Council

Mr. Caplin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on the outcome of the Energy Council meeting on 8 December [22083]

Mr. Battle: The Council considered several issues and received reports on matters of interest. I represented the UK.

Council reached political agreement on a draft common position on the gas liberalisation directive. The main elements of the agreement include a requirement for a minimum initial market opening of 20 per cent., increasing to 28 per cent., after five years from entry into force and 33 per cent. after ten years. All gas-fired power generators will, from the beginning, be able to obtain competitive supplies. Initial thresholds for eligible industrial customers were set at 25 million cubic metres (mcm), dropping to 15 mcm after five years and 5 mcm by year ten. Member States were given the option to introduce separate arrangements for the inclusion of industrial combined heat and power producers.

The agreement also includes provision for eligible customers and third party suppliers to have access to gas transportation networks and requires Member States to put in place an independent authority to settle disputes about access. Network companies will be required not to abuse information received from third parties and to publish the main commercial conditions for use of their network. The agreement also contains provisions to provide access to upstream pipelines in a manner which takes account satisfactorily of the particular nature of upstream activity.

The draft common position recognises that market opening could lead to transitional problems for major gas companies and allows Member States, subject to clearance by the Commission, to agree to the possibility of their companies refusing network access where competition leads to serious financial difficulties in respect of long term take or pay contracts. Transitional arrangements will also be available to countries or areas of countries without a developed gas supply infrastructure (the latter subject to Commission authorisation) where the immediate implementation of the directive would create difficulties concerning the promotion of investment in gas networks.

The Government welcome the agreement reached as a first step in opening the EU market for natural gas. Liberalisation will boost EU competitiveness and bring the UK new opportunities for trade, investment and employment. The draft common position is compatible with the existing competitive arrangements in the UK market. The proposal will be submitted to the European Parliament for consideration during the UK Presidency once a formal common position has been adopted.

The Council received a presentation from the Commission on a White Paper and Action Plan on a strategy for the future of renewable sources of energy and a reached common position on a Council decision concerning a multinational programme for the promotion of renewable energy sources in the Community—ALTENER II. A two year programme with a budget of 22 mecu was agreed. I gave my full support to the ALTENER II programme which I regard as an important element in the Commission's proposals to increase the use of renewable energy sources.

Council approved a resolution on combined heat and power. The resolution welcomed the publication of a Community strategy to promote CHP recognising its positive contribution to environmental policies particularly towards the target to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, and invited the Commission to continue its work.

Council approved a proposal to extend the SYNERGY programme aimed at the promotion of international cooperation in the energy field. A one year extension with a budget of 5 mecu was agreed subject to formal receipt of the European Parliaments opinion.

In addition, the Council received presentations from the Commission on its proposal for a Council decision for a multiannual energy framework programme for actions in the energy sector, and a progress report on the Energy Charter Treaty.

CABINET OFFICE

Millennium Exhibition

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Minister without Portfolio (1) if he will list those companies invited to tender for licensing rights for the Millennium Exhibition indicating which companies submitted tenders; and which companies submitted tenders uninvited; [20695]

(2) when he expects to announce the appointment of a company to market the licensing rights of the Millennium Exhibition; [20694]

(3) if he will place in the Library a copy of the invitation to tender for licensing rights for the Millennium Exhibition; [20667]

(4) how many companies were invited to tender for licensing rights for the Millennium Exhibition; by what date tenders had to be submitted; and how many companies tendered; [20693]

(5) in which publications in the EU the invitation to tender for licensing rights for the Millennium Exhibition was advertised. [20668]

Mr. Mandelson: On 17 July 1997 the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) advertised in the Official Journal of European Communities (OJEC) for expressions of interest from companies to manage the licensing of merchandise for the Millennium Experience. The NMEC contacted ten companies drawing their attention to the OJEC advertisement. Those wishing to be considered for invitations to tender were required to submit standard corporate documentation by 29 July. Four expressions of interest were received—two from companies whom NMEC had contacted and two from companies not contacted directly by NMEC. In 12 August NMEC invited all four to tender, seeking written submissions by 26 August. Two companies submitted full bids.

Subsequently the NMEC has reviewed the option of conducting licensing through in house resources. The NMEC expects to take a final decision shortly on the preferred approach. In the meantime, I have placed in the libraries of the House copies of the OJEC advertisement and copies of the NMEC's Invitation to Tender.

It is not normal business practice to reveal the names of companies who bid for, but who are not awarded, contracts. To do so runs the risk of damaging their competitive position in their particular markets. It is also the case that European Union regulations stipulate only that the name of the winner of contracts be announced. Nevertheless, for the future, I can confirm that at the initial stages of competitive tendering exercises, the NMEC will ask companies to indicate whether or not they are content for their names to be revealed.

Overseas Visits

Jacqui Smith: To ask the Minister without Portfolio if he will list the overseas visits he has made, indicating the date and purpose of the visit in each case. [21580]

Mr. Mandelson: I have visited:

Paris from 17–18 July, for discussions with ministerial counterparts and others, and to speak at a seminar arranged by the British Council;

Germany from 11–13 September, for discussions with ministerial counterparts and others in Bonn, and to attend the Club of Three meeting in Munich;

Rome from 9–10 October, for discussions with ministerial counterparts and others, and to deliver a lecture at the Institute of International affairs; and

France from 27–28 November, for discussions with ministerial counterparts and others in Paris, and to visit Futuroscope in Poitiers in my capacity as minister responsible for the Millennium Experience at Greenwich.

My discussions have concentrated largely on EU-related issues of mutual interest.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Access to Information

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to his oral answer of 11 December 1997, Official Report, column 1193, on access to information concerning grants to farmers and landowners, if access to the nature and the amounts of grant or subsidy will be included. [21249]

Dr. David Clark: All such information held by the public authorities concerned would be within the scope of the proposed Freedom of Information Act set out in the White Paper "Your Right to Know". Whether the information could be disclosed in particular cases would depend on whether it passes the substantial harm and public interest tests integral to the Act's access provisions.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list those departments, agencies and non-departmental public bodies who had not provided him with a completed, fully costed and prioritised plan for dealing with their millennium computer compliance problems by (a) 1 November and (b) 1 December. [21553]

Dr. David Clark: Plans were sought from central Government Departments and agencies, and all had responded by the time I made my statement on 27 November 1997, Official Report, column 1104–05.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what problems to date have been encountered across government as a consequence of the millennium computer compliance problem; and if he will make a statement. [21551]

Dr. David Clark: I refer the hon. Member to the assessment in the statement I made to the House on 27 November. I have also written to departments asking for further information on three particularly important issues: the need to ensure that plans are not impeded by the possibility of skill shortages; the need to look at embedded chips in timing and other control devices; and, ensuring contingency plans are in place.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the areas of the public sector for which he has responsibility for assessing and guiding the progress towards computer millennium compliance; and if he will make a statement. [21547]

Dr. David Clark: I am responsible for co-ordinating activity by central government departments and agencies. These are the 137 organisations listed in the Year 2000 plans which I placed in the Libraries of the House and published on the Internet following my statement to the House on 27 November.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if millennium computer compliance problems in the public sector will be triggered on the date 9 September 1999; and if he will make a statement. [21552]

Dr. David Clark: The comprehensive guidance by the Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency to departments and agencies explained that dates other than 1 January 2000 might affect systems. Departments and agencies are thus aware that their systems audits must take this into account.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to his oral statement on Computers and the Century Date Change of 27 November, Official Report, column 1104, what margin of error is attached to the £370 million total cost estimated; and if this figure includes expenditure on resolving the embedded chip problem in all Government Departments. [21548]

Dr. David Clark: I refer the hon. Member to the statement I made to the House on 27 November. I indicated that I would be monitoring progress being made by departments and agencies. That will include any amendments to their cost estimates.

I also wrote on that day to colleagues about a number of follow-up issues, including the need to ensure that all plans properly addressed the embedded chip issue.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the dates in 1998 on which he intends to make his quarterly statement updating progress in dealing with the millennium computer compliance problem in the public sector; and if he will make a statement. [21550]

Dr. David Clark: I intend to report progress in dealing with the millennium computer compliance problem in Government Departments and agencies to the House on a quarterly basis, starting in spring 1998.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his policy on the final date by which millennium computer compliance across the public sector should be completed; and if he will make a statement. [21546]

Dr. David Clark: I would refer the hon. Member of the statement I made to the House on 27 November. The guidance to departments and agencies makes clear that account should be taken of dates other than 1 January 2000 which might affect systems.

Information Technology

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his estimate of the total annual expenditure on information technology systems across (a) central Government and (b) the rest of the public sector; and if he will make a statement. [21549]

Dr. David Clark: The latest estimate I have of IT spend for central Government is approximately £2.5 billion per annum. The figure for the rest of the public sector is not held centrally and can only be provided at disproportionate cost.

SOCIAL SECURITY

War Pensions

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans her Department has to ensure that all local authorities introduce full disregard of war pensions in respect of council tax; and if she will make a statement. [13148]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The disregard of War Pensions by local authorities applies to Housing Benefit as well as Council Tax Benefit. We are reviewing Housing Policy, Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions as part of the modernisation of social security. All aspects of Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit are open to review, including disregards.

Carers

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate she has made of the number of people who act as carers for others; and what is her estimate of the numbers in each of the next three years. [20673]

Mr. Denham: The 1990 General Household Survey indicates that around 6.8 million people in Great Britain provide some care informally for elderly or disabled relatives or friends. No assessment has been made of future numbers.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many households in each local authority area register will be receiving council tax benefit if each local authority raises its expenditure to the provisional capping limit announced in the local government settlement on 2 December. [20565]

Mr. Field [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The average number of Council Tax Benefit claimants would be approximately 35,000 higher in England, if each English local authority raised its expenditure to the provisional capping limit announced in the local government settlement on 2 December.

Notes:

1. The figure is rounded to the nearest 5,000.

2. Modelled using 1995–96 Family Resources Survey data uprated to 1997–98 prices, benefit and earnings levels, and provisional 1998–99 Council tax levels.

Retirement (Women)

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will estimate the percentage of women retiring in (a) 1998, (b) 2015, (c) 2035 and (d) 2045 who will be entitled to a full category A retirement pension. [20808]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

The pensions review is one of the Government's key priorities. As part of the review we will be looking at ways to narrow the pensions gap between men and women so as to give women more security in retirement. We are also seeking to raise awareness of pensions issues.

As at September 1997, of women who are aged 60 within the previous year and are in receipt of any Retirement Pension, 15 per cent. are in receipt of a full Category A Retirement Pension. Projections in the same form for future years are not available.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 9 December 1997, Official Report, column 533, on invalidity benefit, what estimate she has made of the amounts and the proportion of the savings in (a) 1995–96 and (b) 1996–97 on invalidity benefit which have been made in each Welsh benefit district. [21095]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested as it is not possible to estimate accurately the proportion of the savings accruing from the introduction of Incapacity Benefit in each Welsh benefit district.

Disability Benefits

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the estimated saving in (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000 from the introduction of incapacity benefit. [21576]

Mr. Denham: The estimated savings from the introduction of Incapacity Benefit are in the table.

1997–98	1,350
1998–99	1,830
1999–2000	2,190

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of the growth in expenditure on disability benefits since 1979 is attributable to recipients who are (a) above pension age, (b) within five years of pension age and (c) children. [21522]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information that is available on caseloads for Attendance Allowance and Mobility Allowance in 1979 and Disability Living Allowance for 1997 is given in the tables below. These benefits provide help to disabled people with the extra costs incurred because of the effects of their disabilities. Expenditure on these benefits has increased in real terms by 926 per cent. from 1978–79 to 1996–97.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what millennium compliance problems have occurred to date in her (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) other public bodies; and if she will make a statement. [21558]

Mr. Field: The Department has been aware of the potential impact of the Year 2000 for some considerable time and an analysis of our major systems was carried out in 1996. This analysis confirmed that DSS' major systems, for example the Income Support and Retirement Pension computer systems, would only require minor attention. This is because these systems store dates in a way that is unaffected by the year 2000. Prior to completion of the analysis, some systems using forward dates experienced minor problems which were rectified at the time.

The Department is also working with all our third party suppliers to identify products and interfaces that may need remedial action.

The DSS Year 2000 Project was established in July 1996. This project is co-ordinating extensive activity across DSS, and it is working within the Central Communications and Telecommunications Agency (CCTA) approved guidelines for managing IT Projects. We are members of the CCTA Year 2000 Public Sector Group and use this forum to identify common issues and their solutions.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if her Department's estimates of the total costs of resolving the millennium compliance problem include costs relating to the embedded chip problem; and if she will make a statement. [21559]

Mr. Field: Yes.

Hardship Payments

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claimants who have had benefits sanctions imposed for failure to attend or complete work placements under project work have applied for hardship payments; and how many of those have been successful. [21518]

Mr. Field: The information is not available in the format requested.

The number of jobseekers who applied for hardship payments in the period October 1996 to November 1997 was 77,000. The number of hardship awards made for the same period was 70,000. A breakdown of hardship awards made by reasons for sanction is not available.

HEALTH

GP Fundholding (North Essex)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much of the North Essex Health Authority finance allocated to GP fundholders was spent in other health authority areas; and how much of that was spent in the private sector and on which specialties in the last year for which figures are available. [18611]

Mr. Milburn: Information is not held centrally on how much of their budget general practitioner fundholders in North Essex Health Authority spent in other health authority areas.

Neither do health authority accounts identify GP fundholder expenditure in private providers of healthcare, except in aggregate with that in voluntary providers such as hospices and in general practices approved to provide secondary care.

Dental Services

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in each health authority area were removed from NHS dentists' registers because they missed a registration period in each year since 1990. [19655]

Mr. Milburn: The information requested for 1992–93, 1993–94, 1994–95, 1995–96 and 1996–97 has been placed in the Library. The two year registration period for adults was first introduced in October 1990 and so no registrations could have lapsed until 1992–93.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of people in each health authority area who have not made a dental appointment in the last 15 months. [19656]

Mr. Milburn: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 24 November 1997, Official Report, column 423.

Community Health Councils

Mr. Truswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the role of community health councils within the framework set out in his NHS White Paper. [20699]

Mr. Milburn: Community Health Councils have an important role in representing their local population's views in the health service and in providing information and advice to the public.

Carbon Monoxide

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hours training on (a) toxicology and (b) the effects of carbon monoxide is given to medical students; and if he will request the GMC to review its requirements. [20724]

Mr. Milburn: The information requested is not held centrally. Individual university medical schools determine their own undergraduate medical curricula in the light of recommendations from the Education Committee of the General Medical Council, which has a statutory responsibility to determine the extent of the knowledge and skill required for the granting of primary medical qualifications in the United Kingdom. We will ensure that the GMC is made aware of your concern about this matter.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what medical research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the health effects of long-term exposure to carbon monoxide. [20725]

Ms Jowell: We have recently announced the funding of a £1 million joint research programme over 3 years with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions into the effects on health of exposure to air pollutants and damp in the home. The successful research proposals will be announced shortly and include 3 projects on carbon monoxide. We will write to my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Ann Clwyd) towards the end of January with more details.

In addition we are funding a major research initiative on outdoor air pollution with the Medical Research Council and the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. This programme of research began in 1994–95 and is due for completion in 1998–99. Three of the projects funded under this initiative are looking at carbon monoxide alongside other pollutants. However, none are primarily focused on the long term health effects of exposure to carbon monoxide. When the research programme is completed an evaluation of the effectiveness of the research will be made in order to assess where further research is needed.

Young People in Care

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of time that young people are remanded in the care of the local authority by courts. [20692]

Mr. Boateng: I have been asked to reply.

During the year ending 31 March 1996, the latest for which figures are available, young people spent an average of approximately 10 weeks on remand, or committed for trial or sentence, in the care of local authorities in England.

Eye Examinations

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many individuals underwent a routine bi-annual eye examination in (a) each of the three years before 1989 and (b) each of the three years after 1989; and if he will make a statement. [21223]

Mr. Milburn: This information requested is not available since statistics collected on National Health Service sight tests do not show the name of the individual tested and no information was collected on private sight tests until 1993–94.

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proportion of young people (a) under the age of 16 years and (b) aged between 16 and 19 years who are in full-time education take advantage of the bi-annual eye test to which they are entitled; and if he will make a statement; [21222]

(2) what proportion of those people whose income is just above social security benefit levels as defined by a means test take advantage of the bi-annual eye test to which they are entitled; and if he will make a statement; [21220]

(4) what proportion of recipients of jobseeker's allowance take advantage of the recommended and free bi-annual eye test to which they are entitled; and if he will make a statement; [21224]

(5) what proportion of those people in receipt of disability working allowance take advantage of the bi-annual eye test to which they are entitled; and if he will make a statement; [21219]

(5) what proportion of people on income support or family credit take advantage of the bi-annual eye test to which they are entitled; and if he will make a statement. [21221]

Mr. Milburn: Information is not held centrally in the form requested because statistics collected on sight tests do not show the name of the individual tested. The table shows the aggregate number of National Health Service sight tests received by each eligible group with an estimate of the total population of this group. Information is not yet available on income based job seekers allowance as this benefit was only introduced from 26 October 1996.

Eligible group	Number of NHS sight tests 1996–97	Estimated population of eligible group
Disability Working Allowance	[1]31,920	9,400
People entitled to help through NHS low income scheme and partners	331,130	550,000
Income Support/Family Credit	2,231,650	6,330,000

Midwives

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what comparative studies his Department has made of the cost effectiveness of recruiting midwives from overseas compared with employing midwives currently on the register in the United Kingdom but not practising. [21035]

Mr. Milburn: We are not aware that the Department has carried out studies of this kind.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS trusts and health authorities have implemented the NHS Executive recommendation for a minimum F Grade for midwives; and if he will list them. [21034]

Mr. Milburn: Information on midwives' grading is not available centrally, but examples of developments following EL(95)77 are quoted in the Written Evidence from the Health Departments for Great Britain to the Review Body for Nursing Staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine, Review for 1998. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the setting up of health action zones includes provision for developing woman-centred midwifery care as set out in the guidelines of "Changing Childbirth". [21245]

Mr. Milburn: One of the key objectives for health action zones is developing improved, responsive services that are sensitive to local needs. The Government expect health action zones to do this within the framework of national policy, and where proposals include maternity services they should be developed within the principles of responsive woman-centred care.

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the measures announced by the Government to tackle violence, discrimination and stress in the NHS will address the particular problems and risks encountered by midwives in the community. [21247]

Mr. Milburn: The measures we are taking to tackle violence, discrimination and stress in the National Health Service apply equally to all staff including those who work in the community. We have also recently authorised work by the Royal College of Nursing and the NHS Executive with a view to issuing, by the middle of next year, good practice guidance specifically on violence to staff working in the community.

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review the arrangements for the funding and allocation of study leave for the continuing professional development of midwives. [21246]

Mr. Milburn: The arrangements for the funding and allocation of study leave for the continuing professional development of midwives are matters for local National Health Service employers in collaboration with education consortia.

Cannabis

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will take steps to encourage pharmaceutical companies to apply for a Home Office licence to research and trial cannabis and cannabis derivatives for medical use. [21108]

Mr. Boateng: It is Government policy to support well founded medical research. It is for the pharmaceutical industry to make such applications for research in this area as it sees fit. The issuing of licences is a matter for the Home Office and officials have indicated that they are willing to meet pharmaceutical companies to sort out any problems in this regard.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will meet representatives of the BMA to discuss its reports on the therapeutic uses of cannabis. [21107]

Mr. Boateng: We have no plans to meet the British Medical Association. However, Department of Health officials will meet representatives of the BMA in the new year to discuss its report on the therapeutic uses of cannabis.

Health Service Staff (Incomes)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action he is taking in conjunction with the Revenue authorities to monitor the amount of income NHS employees receive from non-NHS sources. [21020]

Mr. Milburn: The Department has in the past commissioned the Inland Revenue to carry out surveys into the earnings of hospital doctors in Great Britain. Surveys were carried out in 1984–85, 1986–87, 1988–89 and 1991–92. The latest of these surveys covers the financial year 1993–94. Consideration is currently being given to future requirements.

Consultants (Private Work)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what methods his Department uses to monitor the level of private work undertaken by NHS consultants; [21019]

(2) what action he is taking to encourage consultants who draw a full NHS salary to limit the amount of private work which they undertake. [21248]

Mr. Milburn: National Health Service consultants are required to devote substantially the whole of their professional time to their NHS duties. Whole-time NHS consultants are permitted to have private practice earnings of up to a maximum of 10 per cent. of their gross NHS salary. Employers where necessary, may ask a consultant to produce fully-audited accounts as a means of certification of the level of private practice work.

EU Working Time Directive

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the articles of the European working time directive from which the National Health Service will be exempted. [21386]

Mr. Milburn: The National Health Service as a whole is not exempt from the scope of the Working Time Directive, but doctors in training are exempt by virtue of Article 1.

Care Homes

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) local authority and (b) private sector care homes there are in each of the London borough council areas. [21383]

Mr. Boateng: Information on the number of local authority and independent sector (private or voluntary) residential care homes and independent nursing care homes in each local authority area is contained in table L1 of Statistical Bulletin "Community Care Statistics 1997 Residential personal social services for adults, England" (Ref. 1997/26 ISBN 1 85839 812 6) which was published earlier this month. Copies are available in the Library.

Infertility Services

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures his Department is taking to redress inequalities in access to infertility services. [21594]

Ms Jowell: The White Paper "The New NHS" outlines a number of steps which the Government will be taking to improve the consistency of service provision throughout the National Health Service. We will challenge and address variations not based on the health needs and wishes of local people. We will aim for maximum consistency while still allowing appropriate local and individual responsiveness.

NHS Trust Boards

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS trust boards in the north-west hold their meetings in private. [21683]

Mr. Milburn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote on 30 July to the chairmen of all National Health Service trusts asking them to ensure that board meetings are open to the public. With the agreement of Parliament, regulations will be confirmed early in the new year making open trust board meetings a statutory requirement. The use of closed sessions will be limited to areas where real harm to individuals or to the operation of the trust would result from an open meeting. Information is not held centrally on the extent to which trusts currently hold meetings in private.

Health Service Staff

Dr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the projected shortfall for (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99 for (i) hospital doctors, (ii) general practitioners and (iii) nurses. [21359]

Mr. Milburn: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each of the major acute PFI schemes prioritised by his Department since May, how much each relevant health trust paid for each of the last three years in annual capital charges to the Treasury. [21402]

Mr. Milburn: National Health Service trusts do not pay capital charges to Her Majesty's Treasury. However, they do repay the interest on their interest bearing debt and may be required to pay a dividend on their Public Dividend Capital. The amounts of interest and dividends repaid for the last three years for each trust is shown in the table.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was, for each of the 15 major acute PFI schemes prioritised by his Department since May, the actual and percentage charge in purchasers' annual revenue commitment to the schemes between outline and full business case. [21414]

Mr. Milburn: Commissioners do not make an annual revenue commitment to schemes at either the outline or full business case stage.

As part of the business planning process for both publicly and privately funded schemes health authorities are required to confirm that the proposals are affordable within the wider context of their plans for healthcare provision. It is the responsibility of the National Health Service trust to ensure that the revenue commitments implied by a scheme can be met from the resources available.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of staffed acute beds at NHS trusts with PFI developments prioritised by his Department since May (a) in 1996 and (b) projected upon completion of the scheme; and what is the percentage charge between the two in each case. [21415]

Mr. Milburn: Figures are provided in the table for the 15 prioritised schemes:

the current number of staffed beds;

the number of staffed beds required following the strategic investment appraisal conducted for the Outline Business Case (OBC); these are the number of beds which would have to be provided in a new hospital using public sector funding;

the number of staffed beds projected to be provided in a new hospital under the PFI solution.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each of the major acute PFI schemes prioritised by his Department since May (a) the cost of renovating the existing facilities and (b) the current estimated cost of the PFI scheme. [21399]

Mr. Milburn: Reliable estimates of the cost for renovating existing facilities are not available.

When the trusts which have had their Private Finance Initiative (PFI) schemes prioritised since May initially identified a case for change, as part of the outline business case supporting this, they produced a list of options. Following procedures set out in the National Health Service Capital Investment Manual for all NHS capital projects, these will have ranged from do minimum to extensive rebuilding. Renovation would have been the basis of one or more of the options considered but may have been combined with other actions such as improved maintenance, replacement of temporary buildings or partial new builds.

Reliable estimated capital values of the PFI schemes are only available where the full business case has been given approval. A list of the capital values for these schemes is given in the table.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much each lead consortium in each of the major acute PFI schemes prioritised by his Department since May will receive for the use of the new hospitals per year upon completion. [21401]

Mr. Milburn: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 15 December 1997, Official Report, columns 59–60 for details of the unitary payments at the schemes at Dartford and Gravesham National Health Service Trust and Carlisle Hospitals NHS Trust.

Since making that reply we are also pleased to announce that the scheme at South Buckinghamshire NHS Trust reached financial close on 16 December.

The estimated unitary payments for South Buckinghamshire NHS Trust are set out in the table.

2. Figures assume that the schemes become operational during 1999–2000, with the delivery of facilities management services beginning in 1998.
3. The figures assume full availability and performance standards are met throughout.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate by scheme the subsidies paid by his Department under the smoothing mechanism to the 15 major acute PFI schemes prioritised by his Department since May. [21413]

Mr. Milburn: No money has been paid under the smoothing mechanism to the 15 prioritised major acute Private Finance Initiative schemes. National Health Service trusts will not receive money from the smoothing mechanism until the PFI hospital becomes operational.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the recent report by Professor Mike Smith of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, on the issue of the millennium problem in the NHS; and if he will make a statement. [21528]

Mr. Milburn: There is no justification for the assumptions on which the statement that up to 1,500 deaths will be caused directly by the Millennium problem was made. In many cases the basis of the figures used is unclear, and in others the figures are out of date.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what monies will be made available to the NHS from the contingency reserve to ensure millennium computer compliance; and if he will make a statement. [21523]

Mr. Milburn: None is planned.

At the present time it is assumed that Year 2000 activities throughout the National Health Service will be financed from existing budgets.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what millennium computer compliance problems have arisen to date within (a) his Department and (b) the NHS, and if he will make a statement. [21529]

Mr. Milburn: In the Department of Health the only problem in operational systems has arisen in electronic diary systems.

The only problems so far identified in the National Health Service have been in Patient Administration Systems, appointment booking and recall modules, where appointments are being made for dates after 31 December 1999. This problem has been addressed by making such appointments manually.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate he has made of the cost of resolving the embedded chip problem in the NHS; what proportion of the NHS information technology systems budget he estimates this will represent; and if he will make a statement; [21524]

(2) what estimate he has made of the cost to the NHS of ensuring millennium computer compliance; and if he will make a statement. [21525]

Mr. Milburn: No estimates have yet been made.

Information should become available after 31 March 1998 when each separate National Health Service Organisation will have completed detailed project plans, detailed inventory and budget estimates.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what risks to NHS patients will arise from (a) the millennium computer compliance problem and (b) the embedded chip problem; what steps he will take to ensure the safety of patients; and if he will make a statement. [21526]

Mr. Milburn: Because of the nature of its work, many failures of computer-based equipment in the National Health Service are potentially life threatening and contingency plans are in place to cope with such problems. The NHS Executive's Year 2000 Programme is working to eliminate risk through the identification and management of potential risks.

The millennium problem is an example of such a potential failure with the advantage that the problem is well known, clearly defined and with a long lead time. It is a priority for NHS Organisations to develop contingency plans. As such, the risk to patient safety is likely to be minimal.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will introduce a model working plan for NHS trusts for dealing with the millennium problem and embedded chip problem; and if he will make a statement. [21527]

Mr. Milburn: Good practice guidance was issued to the National Health Service in October 1997 which identified the management actions needed to address the problem. More detailed guidance will be released to all NHS Year 2000 project managers by the end of December 1997.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if his Department has current dealings with (a) non-governmental organisations and (b) suppliers which are not millennium compliant; and on what date his Department will cease to deal with (i) non-governmental organisations and (ii) suppliers which are not millennium compliant. [20533]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 12 December 1997]: All new contracts for the supply of goods and services to the Department and its Agencies will include a clause requiring the supplier to be millennium compliant or to provide goods that are millennium compliant. The Department will not enter into new contracts without this assurance.

Where millennium compliance is necessary, the relevant existing suppliers have been asked to insert a new clause into their contracts with the Department, or to provide an assurance, that they, or the goods they supply, are millennium compliant. The Department will cease to deal at the appropriate time with existing suppliers who cannot provide this assurance.

The total number of returns issued to individuals in the main April issue for each year since 1994, and the number of these issued to people whose main source of income was from self-employment, rent or investment income, was as follows:

Millions

	Total	of which, main source self-employment, rent or investment income

April 1995	7.42	4.15
April 1996	7.61	4.25
April 1997	7.00	4.19

The criteria used to determine the issue of tax returns do not include whether or not an individual is a pensioner, and the numbers of pensioners issued with tax returns is not available.

Duty Free Sector

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 10 December 1997, Official Report, column 559, if he will commission research to establish (a) the number of jobs in the United Kingdom directly related to the duty free sector and (b) the value of United Kingdom spirit sales in the duty free sector in (i) the United Kingdom and (ii) the rest of the EU. Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the date at which the PAYE computer system at the Inland Revenue will become millennium computer compliant; and if he will make a statement. [21554]

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister how many public appointments he has made since 1 May; and how many and what percentage of these (a) receive remuneration and (b) are of (i) Afro-Caribbean and (ii) Asian origin. [16788]

The Prime Minister: I have made 14 new public appointments since 1 May to bodies listed in the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies"; 64 per cent. receive remuneration. Owing to the small numbers involved the information about ethnic origin cannot be provided since to do so would risk identifying individuals without consent. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has provided information for all Departments in an aggregated form.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish the names of all those people whom he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed and whether they receive remuneration. [19979]

The Prime Minister: The Chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality has met my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on a number of occasions. Leading members of ethnic minority communities have met my right hon. Friend and other Home Office Ministers and Ministers of other Departments. A further opportunity to speak directly to Ministers will be given by my right hon. Friend's recently announced Race Relations Forum. I do not plan to hold regular meetings.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister when he plans to meet the Chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality. [21868]

The Prime Minister: I expect to meet Sir Herman Ouseley from time to time in the course of my official duties.

Beef Import Ban

Mr. Baldry: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral statement of 15 December, Official Report, column 33, if he will make a statement on how the Government will ensure that the policing of the import ban is appropriate. [21846]

The Prime Minister: Imports of animal products from non-EU Member States must be imported through Border Inspection Posts. All consignments undergo documentary checks. Some also undergo identity and physical checks.

Because of our obligations under the EU treaties, there are no routine checks on products from other EU Member States. Border controls were removed on the introduction of the Single Market. Controls on imported animal products depend on random non-discriminatory checks. For the purpose of the SRM controls, we are seeking to introduce a number of measures designed to police the requirement for veterinary certification, involving MAFF and local authorities.

IRA Meeting

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Prime Minister how many letters he has received opposing the visits of IRA Army Council members to Downing Street on 11 December. [21702]

Mr. Ron Davies: £26.8 million was committed under the Dyfed Gwynedd Powys Operational Programme for 1992–93 through the ERDF and ESF Structural funds. The Rural Wales Single Programming Document 1994–99 makes available some £129 million through the ERDF, ESF and EAGGF Structural Funds.

Welsh Health Common Services Authority

Mr. Rhodri Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultations he is undertaking in relation to the future of the Information Group of the Welsh Health Common Services Authority as regards linkage with a health authority or the Welsh Assembly. [21812]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The Department has established a group representing the Authority, Health Authorities and NHS Trusts to consider options for the management of all of the Authority's functions and it will report in the Spring.

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what representations he has received concerning the impact of the Welsh Assembly on the future management responsibility for the information group of the Welsh Health Common Services Authority; and if he will make a statement; [21814]

Mr. Win Griffiths: The Department has established a group representing the Authority, Health Authorities and NHS Trusts to consider options for the management of all of the Authority's functions and it will report in the Spring. I have received one letter about the future of the Information Group and its contents will be taken into account in preparing options.

Mr. Hoon: The number of legal aid certificates issued in respect of personal injury litigation in each of the last three years, by category of case, was as follows:

	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97
Medical negligence	12,198	13,418	9,165
Accidents at work	18,820	18,567	17,141

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Royal Opera House

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received in respect of the Government's policy on the Royal Opera House. [20931]

Mr. Fisher: My right hon. Friend announced on 3 November 1997 that he had asked Sir Richard Eyre to lead a review of the future of the Royal Opera House companies and Covent Garden. Since that announcement we have received over 1,000 letters from a range of sources.

Departmental Corporate Identity Strategy

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the cost of the project to develop his Department's corporate identity strategy; and how many officials from his Department it will involve. [21113]

Mr. Chris Smith: To date, there has been no expenditure on the Department's corporate identity strategy, which is being developed with the assistance of the Design Council.

The current estimate of the costs to develop and implement the Department's corporate identity strategy is £79,000.

Elements of these costs will be off-set against:

(a) on-going departmental projects (eg IiP).

(b) efficiency savings arising from the project. These savings cannot at present be precisely estimated, but are expected to be substantial.

CDT have been appointed to work with the Department on the strategy and a final contract is being negotiated with them to take the process forward in parallel with the Departmental Spending Review.

The exercise is expected to involve wide consultation with Departmental staff and a Steering Group, including staff representatives, has been set up.

Concessionary Television Licences

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many people living in sheltered housing accommodation benefit from the concessions of the television licensing scheme. [21388]

Mr. Fisher: Approximately 398,000 concessionary television licences are currently in force in sheltered accommodation, out of a total of approximately 643,000 concessionary licences. Television licences cover households rather than individuals; the precise number of beneficiaries is therefore not known.

BBC

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will review the system of public funding of the BBC from the licence fee to include an assessment of the effects of its broadcasts on British exports. [21701]

Mr. Fisher: The Government's Agreement with the BBC guarantees the licence fee until the end of March 2002. We intend to conduct well before then a review of the funding arrangements. This will take account of anticipated commercial revenue, including revenue from international programme sales.

CABINET OFFICE

Millennium Exhibition

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio what progress has been made in the process of decontaminating the Millennium Exhibition site at Greenwich; and what steps he has taken to ensure public safety. [21015]

Angela Eagle: I have been asked to reply.

Since English Partnerships, the Government's regeneration agency, purchased the site at Greenwich Peninsula from British Gas in February 1997, work on remediating the land has progressed quickly. British Gas were responsible for the statutory decontamination. English Partnerships has undertaken extensive further work to a standard suitable for accommodating the Millennium Experience. All aspects of the remediation work have been carried out to statutory health and safety standards.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Algeria (Military Exports)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to her answer of 27 November 1997, Official Report, column 645, what is the Government's policy concerning the underwriting of defence equipment sales to the Government of Algeria by the ECGD; and what measures have been taken for the recovery of the £97.8 million not yet recovered. [20569]

Mrs. Beckett: There is currently no medium term or short term ECGD cover for defence equipment sales to Algeria. ECGD medium term and short term cover is primarily available for sales of equipment to Oil and Gas Sector. Recovery of amounts owed to ECGD in respect of military and civil sales is being made through debt rescheduling agreements signed following multilateral negotiations between Algeria and its major creditors under the auspices of the Paris Club.

Plutonium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to her answer of 24 November 1997, Official Report, column 419, if she will make a statement on the number of inspection visits made by Euratom safeguards inspectors to each (a) facility and (b) material balance area at (i) Sellafield and (ii) Dounreay in each year since 1988; and if she will list the annual total of safeguards inspection person-days for each year in this period committed to United Kingdom nuclear facilities by (1) Euratom and (2) International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors. [20778]

Mrs. Roche: Reports on the operation of Euratom safeguards are published periodically by the European Commission. These reports include information on typical Euratom safeguards inspection effort both by country and by type of installation.

The most recent Euratom report, published in 1994, contains figures for total inspection effort in the UK for the years 1989–92. Figures for subsequent years have also been published, most recently in a paper presented at the IAEA Safeguards Symposium held in Vienna in October 1997 (a copy of which will be placed in the Library of the House). These figures show Euratom safeguards inspection effort in the UK rising from slightly under 2,000 person days in 1989 to just over 3,000 person days in 1996. Although the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) do not themselves routinely publish corresponding figures for their inspections in the UK, the information they have provided to us shows that such effort has ranged between approximately 400 and 670 person days per year for the period in question.

In the case of both Sellafield and Dounreay there is essentially continual Euratom inspector presence. The detailed information sought on numbers of Euratom safeguards inspection visits to Sellafield and Dounreay since 1988 is not included in the Commission's reports and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Copies of the Commission's 1994 report and of its reports for previous years have been placed in the Library of the House.

Ministerial Expenses

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the estimated budget for the year from 1 May for (a) travel and (b) other office costs and expenses for her private office. [21766]

Mrs. Beckett: Budgets are allocated on an annual basis for a financial year beginning in April.

The 1997–98 budget in my office for travel and subsistence is £90,000.

Other office costs and expenses, including staff salaries, for the same period total £766,000.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many official functions of her Department she has held in her official apartment since 1 May. [21767]

Mrs. Beckett: Three.

Government Chemist

Dr. Starkey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when she expects to receive the Annual Review of the Government Chemist for 1996–97. [22246]

Mrs. Beckett: I have today received the Annual Review of the Government Chemist for 1996–97. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

Coal Industry

Mr. Fallon: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list the deep-mine collieries which she and her fellow Ministers have visited since 1 May. [19178]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 4 December 1997]: I visited a number of deep mines before assuming responsibility for coal industry matters. My concern has been to deal with the substantial problems that had been created for the coal industry not least at Asfordby mine and Monktonhall whose representatives I have met on a number of occasions since 1 May. This has required intensive exchanges with key players, particularly representatives of the industry at all levels, and the development of policies to establish a level playing-field for coal at home and new markets for coal abroad.

Energy

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to the Prime Minister's oral answer of 10 December 1997, Official Report, columns 1002–03, when she expects to announce the Government's proposals relating to the long-term energy requirements of the country. [20912]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The timetable of the review of our policy towards approval of new power stations, including the role which coal should play, will be announced shortly.

Mr. Garnier: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment she has made of the relative efficiencies of coal-fired, gas-fired and oil-fired electricity power stations; and if he will make a statement. [21273]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 16 December 1997]: These vary according to the design and technology used. Modern Combined Cycle plant, all of which is presently gas fired, can achieve thermal efficiencies of up to 55 per cent. with the latest designs. This compares to typical operating efficiencies in the range 36 per cent. to 39 per cent. for plant using more conventional technology be they coal, oil or gas. More advanced clean coal plant based on combustion and gasification technologies are now available which offer efficiencies of 43 per cent. or more. Properly sized combined heat and power plant can achieve thermal efficiencies considerably in excess of any of the above.

In assessing our future policy towards the electricity industry the Government are taking into account the contribution made by each fuel to its overall goal of ensuring security diversity sustainability and competitive prices.

Domestic Gas Appliances

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many domestic gas appliances were condemned as unsafe by registered installers in the last year for which figures are available; and in how many cases this was due to the emission of carbon monoxide. [20722]

Angela Eagle: I have been asked to reply.

I am advised by the Health and Safety Executive that the information is not available in the form requested. However, under the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurrences Regulations 1995 gas installers registered with the Council of Registered Gas Installers (CORGI) have a duty to notify to the Health and Safety Executive any gas fitting, or any flue or ventilation, used in connection with that fitting which is or has been likely to cause death, or any major injury by accidental leakage of gas; inadequate combustion of gas; or inadequate removal of the products of combustion of gas.

The latest provisional figures for 1996–97 show that the Health and Safety Executive received 5,819 such notifications. A breakdown of these is given in the Health and Safety Commission's "Health and Safety Statistics 1996–97" (page 163) a copy of which has been placed in the House library. However, the data do not show how many appliances were considered dangerous because they were emitting carbon monoxide.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Smoking

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) improvement notices, (b) prohibition notices and (c) prosecutions the HSE has initiated in each of the last three years in relation to the hazards of (i) smoking and (ii) passive smoking. [20124]

Angela Eagle: There were no legal proceedings taken by HSE's Field Operations Directorate in each of the last three years in relation to the hazards of (i) smoking and (ii) passive smoking in the workplace.

There were no notices issued in 1996–97' in relation to the hazards of smoking and passive smoking. The information is not available for the two preceding years.

HSE Inspectors are asked to promote the development of workplace smoking policies, where appropriate, to reduce employees' exposure to environmental tobacco smoke. This approach will be reviewed once new evidence on the risks of passive smoking has been considered further.

'Figures for 1996–97 are provisional.

Sonar Equipment

Mr. Alan Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in what year side scan sonar equipment became available to (a) the Royal Navy and (b) offshore oil exploration companies. [20358]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Side scan sonar equipment has been available to the Royal Navy since the Second World War. It was optimised for use in the relatively shallow waters of the Continental Shelf. In the mid-1970s the capability of equipment held by commercial oil exploration companies to locate and identify objects on the seabed was similar to that available to the Royal Navy.

EU Transport Directive

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made on European Commission Proposed Directive OJ C25/28.1.93 concerning the minimum safety and health requirements for transport activities and workplaces on means of transport. [20470]

Ms Glenda Jackson: There has been no progress made on reaching agreement on this proposed Directive since 1993.

Water Consumption

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what measures he intends to take to make new buildings more water efficient; and if he will make a statement; [20345]

(2) what measures he intends to take to promote greater water efficiency in households; and if he will make a statement. [20344]

Angela Eagle: The Environment Act 1995 introduced a duty for the water companies to promote the efficient use of water by their customers. At the Water Summit we encouraged the water companies to fulfil this duty with vigour, imagination and enthusiasm. We also said that we would make new Water Regulations which would include significantly tighter requirements for water efficiency.The Water Regulations Advisory Committee have recently consulted on their proposals and we are now considering their recommendations.

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what the average water consumption per person in each region of England and Wales (a) was in 1977, (b) was in 1987, (c) is estimated to be in 1997, (d) is projected to be for the year 2007 and (e) is projected to be for the year 2017. [20343]

Angela Eagle: Forecasts of per capita consumption for the years 2007 and 2017 will be collected by the Office of Water Services as part of its forthcoming Periodic Review. At the last review projected per capita consumption estimates were not separated from estimates of supply pipe leakage for the years in question. There are no published figures for 1977 and 1987. The average domestic water consumption per capita for 1996–97 in each water undertaker's area in litres per day is:

	Litres per day
Water and sewerage companies
Anglian	152.0
Dwr Cymru	145.6
North West	136.4
Northumbrian	143.4
Severn Trent	136.4
South West	151.9
Southern	156.4
Thames	158.7
Wessex	143.1
Yorkshire	131.0
Water only companies
Bournemouth and West Hampshire	164.3
Bristol	155.9
Cambridge	148.1
Chester	154.4
Essex and Suffolk	160.3
Folkestone and Dover	156.7
Hartlepool	152.3
Mid Kent	166.1
Mid Southern	167.5
North Surrey	160.2
Portsmouth	161.6
South East	165.0
South Staffordshire	146.5
Sutton/South East	169.5
Tendring Hundred	145.7
Three Valleys	170.6
Wrexham	148.8
York	142.4

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his estimate of the quantity of extra water resources required to meet the demand of the projected 44 million extra households up to the year 2016. [20342]

Angela Eagle: The latest household projections show the need for 4.4 million additional households between the years of 1991 and 2016. It is for water companies to quantify and provide the water supplies required. This is a normal part of the planning process.

VDU Users (Eye Tests)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many visual display unit users have exercised their legal right to have their eye tests paid by their employer since 1993. [20479]

Angela Eagle: Exact information on eye tests under the Health and Safety (Display Screen Equipment) Regulations 1992 is not available, as there is no requirement for employers to report the number of tests provided. However, a survey commissioned by the Health and Safety Executive estimated that by mid-1995, nearly a million users had received eye tests provided by their employer since the Regulations were introduced in January 1993.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps his Department is taking to ensure that employers are meeting their legal obligations under the Display Screen Equipment Regulations 1992 on eye tests for employees. [20459]

Angela Eagle: The Health and Safety Executive is revising its guidance booklet "Working with VDUs" for publication early next year, which will help make both employers and their workforce more aware that employers have a duty to provide display screen users with eye tests on request. HSE and local authority inspectors will continue to advise employers how to comply with all aspects of the Regulations.

Health and Safety

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list (a) the number of workplace inspections made by Health and Safety Executive inspectors and (b) the number of prohibition notices that were issued for each of the last four years. [20404]

Angela Eagle: HSE inspectors carry out a range of different types of workplace inspections, for example proactive or planned inspections; visits associated with special projects; visits connected with enforcement matters; and advisory visits. During their visits, inspectors may issue a prohibition or "stop" notice on a dangerous activity if the circumstances warrant it. Over the past four years HSE inspectors made the following numbers of planned inspections:

1993–94: 156,233;

1994–95: 146,330;

1995–96: 124,010;

1996–97: 115,728.

Over those years inspectors issued the following numbers of prohibition notices:

1993–94: 4,105;

1994–95: 4,296;

1995–96: 3,467;

1996–97: 3,627.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the number of factories that were revealed not to be registered with the Health and Safety Executive following visits by HSE inspectors in each of the last four years. [20405]

Angela Eagle: I regret that the information requested is not recorded by the Health and Safety Executive and cannot therefore be supplied. Not all occupiers of workplaces for which HSE enforces health and safety are required to register with HSE. HSE's primary concern is with conditions in workplaces, regardless of how they came to its attention. To identify those factories which were first recorded following visits by HSE inspectors would involve a disproportionate cost.

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement regarding increases in budget provision of the Health and Safety Executive in this Parliament. [21391]

Angela Eagle: The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions announced its spending priorities for 1998–99 on Tuesday 16 December 1997, Official Report, column 158–59, which include an extra £4.5 million for health and safety. This budget increase reflects the Health and Safety Commission's estimates of the amount required to maintain direct field activity at 1996–97 and 1997–98 levels, to reinforce activity on railways and major hazards, and to start work on other agreed priorities, including increased promotion of occupational health (especially further action on stress and asbestos), continuing initiatives directed towards small firms, and protection of homeworkers.

Provision for future years will be announced in the summer, following the completion of the Government-wide Comprehensive Spending Review and discussion of priorities.

Mox Plutonium Fuel

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Minister for Transport replied to the letter sent to him on 5 November by the President of the Nuclear Control Institute concerning the use of roll-on/roll-off ferries to transport mox plutonium fuel; and what reply he gave. [20766]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Nuclear Control Institute is an American pressure group that has taken an anti-nuclear stance on a number of occasions. Officials replied to its letter on 2 December. Official replies are confidential to the recipient and cannot be divulged without their express prior permission.

Carbon Monoxide

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will review the current standard for carbon monoxide alarms. [20758]

Angela Eagle: The current British Standard entitled "Carbon Monoxide detectors (electrical) for domestic use" (BS 7860) for carbon monoxide alarms was published in March 1996. The aim of monitors meeting this standard is to save lives by detecting high levels of carbon monoxide; it is not intended to detect carbon monoxide levels that may give rise to chronic illness.

My Department and the Department of Health jointly commissioned a comprehensive assessment of the risks associated with exposure to carbon monoxide in the home. This report is to be published next year. We will review the need for additional action in light of this assessment and the information from the Carbon Monoxide Support's research.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he has taken to establish the prevalence of long term exposure to carbon monoxide in the home and in the workplace; and what steps he is taking to increase public awareness of this issue. [20757]

Angela Eagle: My Department and the Department of Health jointly commissioned the Medical Research Council's Institute for Environmental Health to undertake a comprehensive assessment of the risks associated with exposure to carbon monoxide in the home. This assessment has been endorsed by the Department of Health's Advisory Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollution (COMEAP) and is to be published in the New Year. My Department is now considering what further measures should be taken in light of this report.

In 1997, the Health and Safety Commission's (HSC) Working Group on the Assessment of Toxic Chemicals endorsed the Health and Safety Executive's risk assessment of occupational exposure to carbon monoxide, which includes an assessment of repeated exposure. A proposal to reduce the occupational exposure standards will be considered by HSC's Advisory Committee on Toxic Substances and, if they agree, will be subject to public consultation in May 1998.

My Department and other Government Departments will continue to highlight the dangers of acute poisoning by carbon monoxide through public information campaigns. These include the leaflet"Gas Appliances: Get them checked, keep them safe" (Health and Safety Executive) which is available in English and Welsh and has recently been published in five Asian languages and mailed to relevant community organisations. Also, the Department of Trade and Industry is to circulate information to all gas users warning the public of the dangers of faulty gas appliances. We are also considering a separate leaflet publicising the risks of carbon monoxide poisoning from solid fuels.

Landfill Sites

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 19 November 1997, Official Report, columns 202–03, if he will list the known quantities of low-level radioactive waste deposited at each of the disposal sites. [20779]

Angela Eagle: There is no legal requirement for landfill operators, or those disposing of radioactive waste, to inform the Environment Agencies of each disposal. They must, however, maintain records of the quantities of radioactive waste disposed and make these available for inspection by the Environment Agencies. The information requested is therefore not available centrally.

Waste Management

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what legislation currently governs the use of untreated sewage on agricultural land. [20669]

Angela Eagle: The Controlled Waste Regulations 1992 (S.I. 1992/588) prescribe as industrial waste sewage disposed of in or on land (other than within a sewage treatment works) and sewage removed from a privy or cesspool. The effect of this is to apply the waste management controls of Part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to the recovery or disposal of these wastes.

The use of sewage sludge (a by-product of the sewage treatment process), including untreated sewage sludges, is controlled under the Sludge (Use in Agriculture) Regulations 1989 (S.I. 1989/1263).

Kyoto Conference

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what initiatives his Department is supporting in central and eastern Europe to assist in the collection, storage and analysis of reliable data on atmospheric pollution levels and climate change indicators; and on what occasions these matters were discussed at the Climate Change Conference in Kyoto. [20769]

Angela Eagle: No such initiatives are being supported by my Department; neither were such matters discussed formally in Kyoto.

Lead in Water

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many dwellings are considered to be unfit for human habitation because the drinking water contains lead in excess of 50 µg/l due to the presence of lead pipework in the dwelling; and if he will make a statement. [21257]

Angela Eagle: On the basis of information up to 1995, it is estimated that about 700,000 dwellings then had a water supply with a lead concentration exceeding 50 µg/litre. Measures have been taken by water companies since then in many areas to reduce the ability of water to dissolve lead, and this may have reduced the number of dwellings affected.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of dwellings which will be considered to be unfit for human habitation when the standard for lead in drinking water at the tap is 10 µg/l by the proposed Directive on Drinking Water; and if he will make a statement. [21258]

Angela Eagle: The standard of 10 µg/l in the proposed EC Drinking Water Directive would not apply until 15 years after adoption of the Directive, and would apply to water as supplied to the property, not at the tap. Water companies will be expected to comply with the new limit by the due date.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many dwellings were considered unfit for human habitation in (a) the 1991 and (b) the 1996 English House Condition Survey due to the presence of lead pipework and the plumbosolvent nature of the water supplies; and if he will make a statement. [21256]

Angela Eagle: This information is not available from the English House Condition Survey. Though surveyors were asked to record the presence of lead pipework, they were instructed to exclude it from any assessment of unfitness as it is not practical to measure the concentration of lead in the water supply during the physical survey.

Roads (M66)

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects the M66 Denton to Heaton Park motorway to be open; which contracts for it are running late and by how much; which contracts have been granted extensions and for what reasons; which contracts have overrun their cost estimates by how much and for what reasons; and when the number 3 Audenshaw reservoir will be back in use. [21102]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The M66 extension from Denton to Middleton is programmed to be open to traffic in the year 2000. Construction is split into 4 Contracts, each of which needs to be complete before the scheme can be fully open to traffic.

Work is either under way or complete on 3 of the contracts and were are currently seeking tenders for the fourth; we hope to start work on this one early next summer with a two year contract period.

The contracts let so far have been in the traditional form of civil engineering contracts published by the Institute of Civil Engineers. This form of contract allows for payment to be made for the actual work undertaken, rather than an estimate at the time of tender, so where additional work becomes necessary, costs will rise.

So far, we know that the tender prices for the three contracts will be exceeded but we cannot yet say by exactly how much because we have not settled final accounts.

The contracts also allow for extensions of time for completion of the works in certain circumstances. On this scheme, the contract periods have so far been extended on Contract 1 by 46 weeks, on Contract 2 by 35 weeks and Contract 4 by 37 weeks to allow for unforseen ground conditions such as the extent of contaminated land and difficulties with statutory undertakers plant. Work has also been delayed by bad weather.

Contract 1 is now expected to be complete in February 2000. Contract 2 was contractually completed this month.

The traditional form of contract can provide good value for money when things work out as planned. There are difficulties, however, and the Highways Agency has been reviewing its procurement strategy and in the future will make use of alternative forms of contract which pass more risk to the contractor. The Agency is also keen to encourage a partnering approach on its contracts. In line with that approach the latest contract is being tendered on the basis of design and build.

The new dam for Audenshaw No. 3 reservoir is being constructed as part of Contract 1. Completion is expected in 1999 when the dam will be handed over to the North West Water who will decide when it will be back in use.

Home Energy Efficiency Scheme

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate how many homes could be assisted under the home energy efficiency scheme for £380 million over two years. [21254]

Angela Eagle: £380 million would be sufficient to pay up to 2.3 million grants to householders under this scheme, assuming that the average grant value remained at its present level and that the scheme's infrastructure could cope with such a volume within a two year period. I intend to review the scheme as soon as possible to find out if it is helping the right people in the most effective way.

Road Haulage

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will restrict movements of heavy and wide loads to off-peak periods. [21494]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Proposed movements of vehicles and loads in excess of 80 tonnes and those in excess of 2.9 metres in width are required to be notified to the police. The timing of the movement is at the discretion of the Chief Officer(s) of police in the area(s) in which the movement is to take place. The Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) has recommended to Police Forces that abnormal loads should, where possible, be moved at off-peak periods, including, where it is safe to do so, the hours of night. In timing the movement of such loads, it must be recognised that large loads frequently require police escort. This places considerable demands on resources and the Police service generally finds it difficult to provide a flexible escort service because other operational policing requirements frequently have to take priority at short notice. This can mean that Police Forces are sometimes left with no alternative but to escort loads at busy periods.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what regulations govern the movement of heavy and wide loads on the motorway network. [21493]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The movement of heavy and wide loads on all types of roads is governed by either the Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1986, the Special Types General Order 1979 or in the case of loads greater than 150 tonnes or wider than 6.1 metres by Order made under Section 44 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 issued by my Department. Movements of any load in excess of 5.0 metres is also subject to the agreement of my Department. Vehicles and loads in excess of 38 tonnes are required to be notified to the highway and bridge authorities on the proposed route. Those over 80 tonnes in weight and those in excess of 2.9 metres wide are required to be notified to the police areas in which the route passes.

Commuter Journeys

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of daily commuting journeys (a) to London, (b) to Birmingham and (c) to Bristol in (i) 1980, (ii) 1990 and (iii) the latest year for which figures are available. [21772]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The average number of journeys to work per weekday in London was just under 3 million for the period 1992 to 1996. Data are not available for other years, or for Birmingham or Bristol.

Source: National Travel Survey.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the number of daily commuting journeys in England, of (a) up to 10 miles, (b) 10 to 25 miles, (c) 25 to 50 miles and (d) over 50 miles, for (i) 1975, (ii) 1980, (iii) 1985, (iv) 1990 and (v) the latest year for which figures are available. [21779]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Figures for the average number of journeys to work per weekday, for residents of England, are available only for the years shown:

	Total weekday journeys (millions)
	1985–86	1989–91	1994–96
Up to 10 miles	15.3	15.1	13.3
10 to under 25 miles	2.5	2.9	2.9
25 to under 50 miles	0.6	0.7	0.8
Over 50 miles	0.2	0.3	0.3
All journey lengths	18.6	19.0	17.3

Wheel Loss Survey

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the results of the wheel loss survey completed on 30 April will be published. [21782]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The results of the survey looking into the number of incidents of wheel loss from commercial vehicles are currently being finalised. We expect to make these results known by the end of January 1998.

Housing Developments

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has had from, and what discussions Ministers have had with, the Environment Agency, regarding the impact of current and future new housing development on (a) sustainable water resources and supply, (b) problems of additional loading in sewage treatment works, (c) flood risk protection and (d) sustainable natural uses of flood plains in (i) England, (ii) the south-west region and (iii) Somerset. [21773]

Angela Eagle: My right hon. Friend has received no such representations from, or held discussions with, the Environment Agency on these matters. The issue of flood risk protection is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The position in respect of residential development is that water companies have a statutory duty to provide supplies of water sufficient for domestic purposes and this duty extends to all new premises. Current planning guidance requires local authorities to consult with infrastructure providers, such as water suppliers, when drawing up their development plans.

Vehicle Safety

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the timetable for consultation on the EU Directive relating to special provisions for vehicles used for the carriage of passengers with more than eight seats in addition to the driver's seat and amending Directive 70/156/EEC. [21632]

Ms Glenda Jackson: During the development of this proposed directive both the manufacturers and operators have been consulted extensively. The Government's position on the Commission's proposal has been described in an unnumbered Explanatory Memorandum which was submitted on 30 September and to which a corrigendum, number 9734/97, has since been issued on 11 November. The Commission's proposal will now be subject to detailed discussions by Member States and we will continue to consult interested parties throughout the negotiations. It is not possible to give a precise timetable for the completion of these negotiations.

West Coast Main Line

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what reports he has received from the Franchising Director on the performance of the West Coast main line since privatisation. [22093]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I met the Franchising Director on 15 December to discuss current West Coast performance issues and future investment plans. In addition to that, the Franchising Director has regular liaison meetings with my officials. Key performance issues are routinely discussed at these meetings, including the performance of the West Coast Main Line sinc privatisation. The Franchising Director publishes quarterly bulletins of performance information against Passenger's Charter targets for all Train Operating Companies, and an annual report; these documents are in the Library of the House. The West Coast Main Line franchise was taken over by Virgin Trains on 9 March 1997. Performance of these services is slightly better than it was under British Rail but is still well below Virgin's committed target of 90 per cent. punctuality by March 1998.

Asia Pacific Airlines

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what negotiations he is currently undertaking with Asia Pacific airlines with a view to providing greater competition for the proposed BA–AA alliance on the transatlantic route; and if he will make a statement. [21644]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None. The competition aspects of the proposed BA–AA alliance are being considered by the relevant authorities.

Saudi Arabian Airlines

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to ensure that Saudi Arabian Airlines can operate in summer 1998 in line with the slots allocated to them at the recent schedule co-ordination conference. [21697]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department hopes to hold bilateral air services discussions with the Saudi Arabian authorities early next year. However, the terms of the current bilateral arrangements already make it possible for Saudi Arabian Airlines to operate all the slots which I understand they have been allocated for the summer 1998 season.

Correspondence

Mr. Townend: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Minister for Local Government and Housing expects to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for East Yorkshire, relating to a meeting with the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden

(Mr. Davies), the hon. Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Cran) and the hon. Member for East Yorkshire. [21953]

Ms Armstrong: I replied to the hon. Member's letter on 18 December.

Regional Airports

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the Additional bilateral air service rights for UK and foreign airlines to serve UK regional airports negotiated during 1997. [21696]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Bilateral negotiations during 1997 either enabled or increased the possibility of services between UK regional airports and the following countries:

Argentina, Azerbaijan, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Egypt, Fiji, Ghana, Guatemala, Indonesia, Mexico, Mongolia, New Zealand, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Singapore, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Switzerland, Thailand, United Arab Emirates, Uruguay, and Yemen.

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the occasions in the last three years when a full regional economic impact analysis, using all the factors identified in the CAA Paper, CAP 638, has been carried out in connection with bilateral air service negotiations involving routes to regional airports; and if he will name the routes involved. [21698]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Since the publication of CAP 638, the full regional economic impact analyses have been carried out by the CAA for bilateral talks on air services with Australia, India, Pakistan, Canada (in respect of fifth freedom rights to India), Mauritius, Seychelles, Singapore and United Arab Emirates.

There have been other occasions on which the CAA's economic analyses have looked at the effects of granting additional rights from regional airports, but where full regional economic analyses have not been undertaken.

EU Environmental Impact Assessment Directive

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress has been made towards implementing the requirements of the amended Environmental Impact Assessment Directive (97/11/EC). [22217]

Mr. Caborn: The Government's broad proposals for implementing the amended Environmental Impact Assessment Directive were set out in an initial consultation paper issued on 30 July. In the light of the responses to that paper, I am pleased to announce today the start of a second, more detailed consultation exercise on the thresholds to be used by planning authorities and others as filters in assessing whether a particular project is likely to have significant effects on the environment and so warrant environmental assessment.

The proposed thresholds would apply to a range of projects covered by the Town and Country Planning and other consent systems in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Copies of the consultation paper have been sent to other Government Departments and to a wide range of business, government and environmental organisations. Copies have also been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Comments on the Government's proposals should be made to my Department, the Scottish Office or Northern Ireland Office as appropriate by 27 February 1998.

EU Transport Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the result of the Transport Council held in Brussels on 10 and 11 December. [22250]

Dr. Strang: The Transport Council met in Brussels on 10 and 11 December. My hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London and I represented the United Kingdom.

The Council reached agreement on mandates for the Commission to negotiate Community shipping agreements with India and China. Member States will continue to be involved in the negotiating process and the agreed negotiating mandates reflect this.

The Council agreed an amendment to the EC Directive on Port State Control. This amendment will add the International Safety Management (ISM) code to the list of international safety conventions with which ships must demonstrate compliance when they enter EU ports.

The Council took note of a progress report on discussions following the Commission's communication on maritime external relations, which was considered at the Transport Council in June.

There was discussion of the recent Commission Decision extending application of the Community Regulation (3577/92) on maritime cabotage to the European Economic Area (EEA).

Following a statement by Sweden on the inquiry report into the Estonia disaster, the Commission said it would consider whether new proposals would be required in the light of this and other reports.

The Commission called on the Council for a commitment to decide at the March 1998 Council on a mandate for Community-level negotiations with the US on market access in air transport. A number of Member States, including the UK, questioned the Commission's approach and opposed setting a deadline. There will be a further discussion at the March Council. Commissioner Kinnock underlined his disappointment with this outcome, and said that the Commission would now be pursuing legal action against certain Member States.

The Council agreed that further work preparing for the establishment of a European Aviation Safety Authority should be carried out, on the working hypothesis that the new authority would be set up as an international organisation.

There was a progress report to the Council on preparations for Community membership of the European Organisation for the Safety of Air Navigation (EUROCONTROL); there were also progress reports on the proposed directives on airport charging and on cabin crew training.

The Council (with Germany abstaining) approved an agreement under which the Community will cooperate with EUROCONTROL and the European Space Agency (ESA) on the development of the European segment of a Global Navigation Satellite System (GNSS).

The Council adopted conclusions calling on Russia to end the levying of excessive charges for overflight of Siberia.

The Council had a further discussion of the proposed directive on heavy goods vehicle taxation and charging (the "Eurovignette" directive), but was unable to reach agreement.

The Commission reported on negotiations with Switzerland on land transport. It was agreed that negotiations should continue.

The Council agreed conclusions noting the Commission's intention to produce proposals on working time in road transport and on driver training. A number of Member States commented on the conclusions, which were prompted by a French initiative. The UK accepted the conclusions, stating that it supported the need for decent working conditions for commercial drivers, including working time, but the treatment of working time in Community law needed careful study.

The Council reached agreement on a Directive harmonising vehicle registration documents.

The Council discussed lorry blockades and the Commission suggested ways of facilitating freedom of movement during disputes.

The Commission reported on progress on a proposal to clarify and harmonise weekend and night-time lorry bans; there was also discussion of harmonised Community driving licences.

Ecolabelling Board

Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about a financial, management and policy review of the UK Ecolabelling Board. [22355]

Mr. Meacher: As part of the Government's programme of regular five-yearly financial management and policy reviews of non-departmental public bodies, my Department has now begun a thorough review of the United Kingdom Ecolabelling Board (UKEB).

The first stage of the review will take the form of a "prior options" study, which I expect to be completed by March 1998. This study will assess the extent to which UKEB's functions are necessary and consider both the existing arrangements and possible alternatives for handling these functions.

The review also provides an opportunity to explore what other activities might help improve the provision of environmental information for consumers. My Department will consult widely with organisations which have an interest in this field. As well as issues connected with the delivery of the present EU ecolabelling scheme, views will be invited on the case for a national award scheme and the mechanisms needed to raise the standard of environmental claims generally.

Discharges to Water

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many offences against section 85(1) of the Water Resources Act 1991 were identified by the Environment Agency for each month of 1996 and 1997 to date; and for the same period how many prosecutions were brought; how many have been successful; and how many are outstanding; and what penalties have been applied. [20647]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 15 December 1997]: This information is not available in the form requested. Of the 20,158 substantial pollution incidents recorded for 1996, which in over 90 per cent. of cases were minor and resulted only in localised environmental impacts, the Environment Agency brought 121 prosecutions under section 85(1). Of these, 117 were successful. One custodial sentence was imposed. The maximum fine was £15,000. A further 111 prosecutions relating to incidents in 1996 have been brought to date in 1997. Of these, 108 were successful. The maximum fine imposed was £15,000. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman about the number of outstanding prosecutions which have been brought by the Agency for offences in 1996 and 1997 under section 85(1).

As regards 1997, data for the number of pollution incidents are not yet available. However, 36 prosecutions have been brought to date for incidents which occurred this year. All were successful. The maximum fine imposed was £7,000.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many discharges to water in excess of permitted limits have been identified by the Environment Agency for each month in 1997 to date; how many prosecutions have resulted; how many have been successful; how many are outstanding; and what penalties have been applied. [20649]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 15 December 1997]: Compliance data are collected quarterly by the Environment Agency. The number of discharges which have exceeded their consented limits in each of the first three quarters of 1997 are as follows:

	Numbers
January–March	1,447
April–June	1,023
July–September	966

(The second and third quarter totals do not include figures for the Environment Agency's South West region.) Most dischargers, on being notified of a failed sample, take prompt action to remedy matters.

The Agency has brought seven prosecutions under section 85(6) of the Water Resources Act 1991 for breaches of consent which have occurred this year. Five were successful. The fines imposed ranged from £750 to £10,000. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman with details of the number of outstanding cases where the Agency has brought prosecutions in respect of such offences.

Further to my answer to the hon. Gentleman on 8 December 1997, Official Report, column 422, thirteen prosecutions were taken in 1997 under section 85(6) in respect of breaches of consent which occurred in 1996 in addition to the prosecutions taken in 1996.

Fertilisers and Pesticides

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has, as a way of protecting the rural environment, further to tax fertilisers, pesticides and other products applied to the land. [21105]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply.

The consultation document, "Economic Instrument for Water Pollution", issued by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions on 27 November, invited responses on a number of options to reduce water pollution. One of these options is a tax or charge on pesticides or fertilisers.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Departmental Information

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will place in the Library a copy of the internal departmental guidance on the dissemination of information; and if she will make a statement. [16304]

Mr. Field: A copy of the current guidance on the dissemination of information used by DSS Headquarters has been placed in the Library. The Department's Executive Agencies issue separate guidance for their staff.

Disability Benefits

Mr. Denis Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what percentage of people are currently in receipt of (a) disability living allowance, (b) industrial disablement benefit and (c) incapacity benefit (i) in the United Kingdom and (ii) in the Wansbeck parliamentary constituency. [19276]

Mr. Denham: The administration of social security benefits is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Denis Murphy, dated 18 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many and what percentage of people are currently in receipt of (a) Disability Living Allowance (DLA), (b) Industrial Disablement Benefit (IIDB), and (c) Incapacity Benefit (IB), (i) in the United Kingdom and (ii) in the Wansbeck parliamentary constituency.

The information is not available in the format requested. Statistics for DLA, IIDB and IB are available for Great Britain. Statistics for IIDB and IB are kept for Benefits Agency (BA) Districts and not by parliamentary constituency. The BA's Northumbria District serves the Wansbeck area.

Such information as is available is shown in the attached table.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Number and percentage of customers currently in receipt of Disability Living Allowance (DLA), Industrial Disablement Benefit (IIDB) and Incapacity Benefit (IB)

	DLA—as at 31 August 1997[1][2]	IIDB—as at 30 March 1996[1][3]	IB—as at 31 May 1997[1][4]
Number of customers in Great Britain	1,924,360	244,798	1,732,740
Per cent.	3.0	0.4	3.0
Number of customers in Wansbeck	4,340	n/a	n/a
Per cent.	7.0	n/a	n/a
Number of customers in Northumberland (Northumbria District)	11,860	966	12,040
Per cent.	4.0	0.3	3.9

1. Figures are provisional and subject to change.
[2] Figures based on a 5 per cent. sample of customers in receipt of Disability Living Allowance at 31 August 1997.
[3] Figures based on a 10 per cent. sample of all IIDB assessments.
[4] Figures based on a 5 per cent. sample of customers in receipt of Incapacity Benefit at 31 May 1997. This includes the rates of Incapacity Short Term (Lower), Short Term (Higher) and Long Term. This figure excludes a small number of clerically processed cases.

The percentage figure is calculated by dividing the number of customers in receipt of the benefit by the population estimate for the corresponding area. The population estimate has been provided by the Office of National Statistics and General Registrar of Scotland, population estimate at 1996.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many recipients of each of the main disability benefits have had their benefits (a) reduced and (b) stopped, as a result of the Benefits Integrity Programme; and what proportion of these recipients are over pension age. [21521]

Mr. Denham: One of our key aims is to rebuild integrity in, and public support for, the Social Security system and the way in which public money is spent. We need to focus on those who are properly entitled to benefit. This is why we have set up the Benefit Integrity Project.

The administration of this programme is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Steve Webb, dated 18 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question regarding how many recipients of each of the main disability benefits have had their benefits reduced and stopped as a result of the Benefits Integrity Programme (BIP), and what proportion of these recipients are over pension age.

As at 30 November 1997, the BIP has looked at 27,511 Disability Living Allowance (DLA) awards. Of these awards 2,339 were reduced, 1,152 were disallowed entirely, 23,363 left unaltered and 657 increased. In addition staff working on the BIP have dealt with 5,979 renewal claims of which 1,080 have been disallowed, 1,541 renewed at a lower rate, 3,174 renewed at the same rate and 184 renewed at a higher rate.

The age distribution of the awards changed as a result of the BIP is not available in the format requested. However, the proportion of DLA awards to people over pension age which were looked at, inclusive of the renewal claims dealt with by BIP staff is 10,371. Of these 762 were reduced, 310 were disallowed entirely, while 265 were increased.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Family Credit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average weekly mortgage interest of homebuyers in receipt of family credit; and how many have weekly mortgage interest costs of (i) up to £9.99, (ii) £10–£19.99, (iii) £20–£29.99, (iv) £30–£39.99, (v) £40–£49.99, (vi) £50–£59.99, (vii) £60–£69.99, (viii) £70–£79.99 and (ix) £80 or above. [21785]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is as follows.

According to the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey (FRS) the average weekly mortgage interest cost to homebuyers in receipt of Family Credit (FC) was £31 (rounded to nearest £1).

Counts of FC receipt derived from the FRS do not match administrative sources. Therefore the requested figures for homebuyer FC recipients by mortgage band are shown in the table as percentages rather than grossed up counts. In addition, the requested mortgage interest bands resulted in counts too low to be reliable. Therefore it has been necessary to enlarge the mortgage interest bands used.

Weekly mortgage interest cost	Homebuyers in receipt of Family Credit—percentages within each mortgage interest band
Up to £19.99	33
£20 to £39.99	40
£40 to £59.99	21
£60 or above	6

Notes:

1. The estimates are based on sample counts which have been adjusted for non-response using multi-purpose grossing factors which control for region, Council Tax Band and a number of demographic variables. Estimates are subject to sampling error and to variability in non response.
2. The total count of homebuyers given is based on adult owner occupiers with a mortgage where the benefit unit to which the adult belongs is in receipt of Family Credit. A benefit unit is a single adult or couple living as married and any dependent children.

The figures are based on information from the 1995–96 Family Resources Survey (FRS). The 1995–96 survey is the latest for which data are available.

DSS Estates

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement about recent developments concerning the DSS Estates. [22354]

Ms Harman: To support our aims for an active modern service, and further to my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Rooney) on 31 July 1997, Official Report, columns 591–94, I have today authorised the signing of a contract with Partnership Property Management Limited, which will own and provide the Department with serviced accommodation throughout the country, except for the Tyneside area, which is covered by a separate project. The contract will start on 1 April 1998. This is an imaginative and innovative form of partnership with the private sector which will bring specialist expertise to the management of the estate; deliver improved value for money; result in more investment in our buildings; and allow us to share in gains realised by property developments. It gives us more flexibility to adjust the buildings we occupy to meet our changing service needs, while retaining control over location of our offices. This project, PRIME, has been a major Government procurement. It is a pathfinder project which puts this Department at the forefront of the way in which the public sector manages property.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Local Education Authorities

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what were the rates of improvement in Key Stage 1 SAT results in (a) English and (b) maths (i) for the schools maintained by the City of Birmingham and (ii) nationally between 1991 and 1997. [18580]

Ms Estelle Morris: The national results for Key Stage 1 in English and mathematics of pupils at level 2 and above are as follows:

Percentage

	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997
English	78	77	n/a	'79	'80	'79	'80
Mathematics	78	78	n/a	81	78	82	84

[1] Teacher Assessment results as there is no overall test level.

The Department has not published Key Stage 1 results by local education authority (LEA) since 1992. LEAs can, if they wish, publish the Key Stage 1 results for their schools alongside the 1997 Key Stage 2 results they are publishing in January 1998. The Government plan to publish 1997 Key Stage 1, 2 and 3 results for each LEA early next year.

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list local education authorities in order of performance in terms of (a) percentage points of improvement between 1996 and 1997 based on pupils' achievement at level 4 and above in Key Stage 2 curriculum tests in English, mathematics and science (i) separately and (ii) taken together, and (b) their actual average scores at Level 4 and above in each of those subjects in each year. [18579]

Ms Estelle Morris: The national figures for pupils at level 4 show improvement between 1996 and 1997 as follows:

Percentage point improvement from 1996 in:	Teacher assessment	Test
English	3	5
Mathematics	4	8
Science	4	7

The 1996 Key Stage 2 results by local education authority (LEA) area were published in March 1997 and copies placed in the Library. Each LEA will be publishing the 1997 Key Stage 2 results for schools in its area in January 1998. The Government plan to publish 1997 Key Stage 1, 2 and 3 results for each LEA early next year.

Mr. McCabe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list local education authorities in rank order of deprivation, on the basis of the DoE index of deprivation, and providing for each their position in Key Stage 2 results for summer 1997. [18568]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions produces several deprivation indexes, including an Additional Educational Needs (AEN) index which is used to estimate the cost of providing a standard level of education service. The AEN index for each Local Education Authority (LEA) for 1998–99 is listed below. Each LEA will publish 1997 Key Stage 2 results for schools in its area in January 1998. The Government plan to publish 1997 Key Stage 1, 2 and 3 results for each LEA early next year.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the income derived from tuition fees from medical students will be made available for medical school education. [20967]

Dr. Howells: Universities and colleges will retain the contribution to fees which they collect from students; and also the part of the fee they receive from local authorities, where the student is assessed as paying less than the £1,000. It is for universities with medical schools to decide how much of this income and of the grant received from the Higher Education Funding Council should be made available for medical school education.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if the revenue raised through the introduction of tuition fees wil be used entirely to fund further and higher education by allowing the institutions which collect the money to spend it. [21847]

Dr. Howells: We have made it clear that the savings from the introduction of tuition fees will be used to improve quality, standards and opportunity for all in further and higher education.

For 1998–99 we have already announced that the introduction of private contributions to tuition fees for higher education will mean an extra £125 million for higher education institutions, plus £4 million to allow for a modest increase in students on sub degree courses mainly in FE colleges. In addition some £15 million of the higher education savings has been allocated to the further education sector to contribute to meeting the Government's priorities for reducing social exclusion and increasing employability.

Provision for later years is being considered in the comprehensive expenditure review.

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which body will be responsible for means-testing EU applicants to United Kingdom universities in order to determine the level of their contribution to the tuition fees; how this will be administered; and how much it will cost. [21848]

Dr. Howells: In England and Wales, local education authorities will handle applications for mandatory awards from all new entrants to higher education in 1998–99. The Department intends to offer them substantial practical assistance in handling applications from EU nations. The arrangements in Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Northern Ireland respectively.

Grant-maintained Schools

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what mechanisms will be put in place to enable grant-maintained schools to re-enter the local authority-maintained sector. [21593]

Mr. Byers: The School Standards and Framework Bill will establish a new framework for the organisation of schools. All existing legal categories of mainstream maintained school—including the grant-maintained category—will be replaced by three new categories: community, foundation and voluntary. All three will be maintained by local education authorities.

Special Educational Needs

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of research on the underlying reasons for the increase in statements of special educational need over the last five years. [21508]

Ms Estelle Morris: The number of pupils with statements has risen from 161,000 in 1992 to 233,000 in 1997. Our Green Paper, "Excellence for all children: meeting special educational needs" draws on the views of members of the National Advisory Group on special educational needs and on discussions with schools, local education authorities and voluntary groups. It suggests that the reasons for the increase may include financial and other differential effects of statements. While confirming the continuing importance of statements for children with complex disabilities, the Green Paper seeks views on the case for helping schools to meet the needs of more children without recourse to expensive statutory statementing processes.

Maintenance Grants

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what factors underlay the decision to reject the recommendations of the National Committee of Inquiry into Higher Education to retain maintenance grants for students. [21849]

Dr. Howells: We agree with the National Committee of Inquiry into Higher Education that the Government should continue to provide support towards students' living costs, but we do not believe that general grants for maintenance are the answer to ensuring a modern student support system. Instead, students' living costs should be met out of their future earnings and—in the case of better-off students—by their parents. Compared with those without degrees, graduates on average see their earnings rise by as much as £4,000 for every £20,000 of earnings within about ten years of graduation.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Building (PFI)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the public sector comparator against which the Prison Service has calculated whether the prisons to be built and managed under the Private Finance Initiative at Bridgend and Fazakerley will result in cost savings; what assumptions the comparator includes; if he will publish those calculations; and if he will make a statement. [18092]

Ms Quin: The public sector comparator is the estimated discounted cost of alternative procurement and operation of a prison which will be designed, constructed, managed for 25 years and financed under a private finance initiative contract.

The principal assumptions made in calculating the comparators for the prisons at Bridgend (Her Majesty's Prison Parc) and Fazakerley (Her Majesty's Prison Altcourse) were:

(i) design and construction using public finance;

(ii) operation by a private sector contractor;

(iii) delays and cost overruns at a rate consistent with other recent public sector prison building projects;

(iv) wage inflation at historical average annual rates (2 per cent. above movements in the retail price index);

(v) an additional price increase at the end of the fifth year of the operating contract; and

(vi) the annual cost of public finance would be six per cent. in real terms.

The detailed calculations are not available in publishable form, but the estimated contract costs and savings against the public comparators (in Net Present Value terms) were as follows:

Contract value (£m)	Savings against public sector comparator, per cent.
Bridgend 319	17.0
Fazakerley 248	0.4
Overall savings for both prisons	10.0

In 1996, the public sector comparator for Fazakerley was re-calculated to take account of improved efficiency within the public sector, with two significant changes to the principal assumptions. These were:

(i) operation by the public sector with costs reducing in line with the Prison Service's target of 5.7 per cent. in 1997–98 and salary increases at 0.5 per cent. above the retail price index after that; and

(ii) no delays or cost overruns.

As a result, the contract value for Fazakerley was estimated to be 1 per cent. less than the public sector comparator.

These comparators were examined in the Comptroller and Auditor General's Report on the Private Finance Initiative Contracts for Bridgend and Fazakerley Prisons (HC 253 of session 1997–98).

Voluntary Redundancy

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many provisional applications for voluntary redundancy have been received from junior official grades at (a) the Immigration and Nationality Directorate, (b) the Prison Service and (c) the other agencies and parts of his Department in the last six months; what assessment he has made of morale within his Department; and if he will make a statement. [20617]

Mr. Straw: In October, staff in the grades Administrative Assistant, Administrative Officer, Executive Officer and Higher Executive Officer working in Home Office offices in Croydon and Greater London were invited to make provisional applications for a possible voluntary redundancy scheme. A total of 1,002 provisional applications were received: 517 from the Immigration and Nationality Directorate, 177 from the Prison Service and 308 from the centrally managed Home Office offices.

A number of surveys of staff opinions and attitudes have been carried out in the central Home Office, the Prison Service and the Immigration and Nationality Directorate in recent years. I shall place copies of the Home Office Staff Survey Report 1997 in the Library.

In addition, I have had two formal meetings with the Home Office Trade Union side this year.

Huntingdon Life Sciences

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will suspend the licence granted to Huntingdon Life Sciences to breed beagles. [21333]

Mr. George Howarth: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Ms Kingham) on 18 December 1997, Official Report, columns 262–63.

The care and accommodation for the dogs meet the requirements of the codes of practice and there are no legitimate grounds on which to suspend the Certificate of Designation.

Ministerial Visit

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his visit to Northfields, Leicester. [21873]

Mr. Straw: I was very impressed by the work carried out by Inspector Donaghy and his team to address the problems on the Northfields Estate. This multi-agency approach to tackling anti-social behaviour and neighbourhood disorder fits well with the proposals in the recent Crime and Disorder Bill. The enthusiasm of the Northfields' residents in addressing local problems was particularly striking.

Acklington Prison

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department by what date he expects to implement the recommendations of H.M. Chief Inspector of Prisons relating to (a) the provision of extra work places for prisoners, (b) additional funding for evening classes, (c) weekend drug testing and (d) additional places on drug-free wings at HM Prison, Acklington. [21622]

Ms Quin: Weekend drug testing has already been introduced.

The report was published on 11 December and the governor will produce an action plan within 30 working days of this date which will address all the Chief Inspector's recommendations. Those mentioned in the Question require funding, and bids are currently being considered. These will have to be prioritised against other demands.

Community Protection Orders

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many responses to the consultation paper "Community Protection Orders" were received during the consultation period; and if he will make a statement. [22248]

Mr. Straw: 92 responses were received. A list of the respondents and a summary of the main points raised can be found in the Library in a document entitled "Responses to the Home Office Consultation Document on Community Protection Orders".

Community Penalties and Electronic Tagging

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the pilot projects to test the new community penalties introduced by sections 35, 37, 39, 40 and 43 of the new Crime (Sentences) Act 1997 and electronic monitoring as a condition of bail will begin. [22249]

Ms Quin: The pilot projects will start on 2 January 1998 in Norfolk and in Manchester City Magistrates' Court. The remaining courts in Greater Manchester will be included in the pilot scheme from 1 April 1988. The trials of electronic monitoring as a condition of bail will begin in Norwich Magistrates' Court and Norwich Crown Court on 1 April 1998 and in Manchester City Magistrates' Court and Manchester Crown Court on 1 July 1998.

Freemasonry

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he proposes to respond on behalf of Her Majesty's Government to the Home Affairs Committee's recommendations on freemasonry in the police and the judiciary. [21816]

Mr. Straw: I had hoped to be in a position to do so by the end of November, but our consideration of the issue is not yet completed. I now expect to be able to reply to the Home Affairs Committee in the new year.

Private Sector Employment

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 13 November 1997 to the right hon. Member for Berwick upon Tweed (Mr. Beith), Official Report, column 647, if he will make a statement on the Cabinet Office clearance procedure for former officials of his Department who wish to take employment with private sector contractors; and how many individuals are currently awaiting clearance. [21584]

Mr. Straw: The Business Appointment Rules and associated procedures are set out in full in Annexes A and B to Chapter 4.3 of the Civil Service Management Code, a copy of which is in the Library.

One application by a Prison Service member of staff, for permission to take up an offer of employment from a private sector contractor, is currently awaiting a decision under the rules.

Prisons (Health Care)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 13 November 1997, Official Report, column 651, how many (a) nurses and (b) other health care staff within the prison service are currently undertaking national vocational qualifications in health care management. [20408]

Ms Quin [holding answer 12 December 1997]: Detailed information on course content is not recorded centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Strip Searches

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on how many times Brian McHugh has been strip searched while on remand in HMP Belmarsh. [20336]

Ms Quin [holding answer 16 December 1997]: It is not possible to provide accurate figures on the number of times Brian McHugh has been strip searched whilst on remand at Belmarsh Prison. As a High Risk prisoner, Mr. McHugh is subject to a searching policy appropriate to his security category. In particular, he will be strip searched before and after visits, on entry to and exit from the prison and on entry to and exit from the court. These routine strip searches are not recorded since they are a mandatory requirement of Prison Service security policy.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many strip-searches have taken place in each of the London prisons since 1 January. [21379]

Ms Quin [holding answer 17 December 1997]: This information is not available since prisons do not keep records of all strip searches. However, the Prison Service is reviewing searching and I have asked them to make recommendations on the monitoring of strip searches.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be the projected (i) untried and (ii) convicted unsentenced remand prison population on 1 January 1998. [21537]

Ms Quin [holding answer 18 December 1997]: The number of untried male prisoners is expected to be 8,100 on 31 December 1997, the nearest date to 1 January for which projections are made. The number of convicted unsentenced male prisoners is expected to be 3,000 on 31 December. Female remand prisoners are expected to number 570 on 31 December. The projections do not separate female remand prisoners by whether they are convicted or not.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Soil Erosion

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consideration the Government have given to the recommendation in section 5.41 of the report on the sustainable use of soil from the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution in 1996 on soil erosion control; and if he will make a statement. [20513]

Mr. Morley: The Government believe that the provision of soundly based guidance to farmers should continue to be the centrepiece of public policy on the protection of agriculture soils. For this purpose, Agriculture Departments have made available a wide range of advice about the protection of soil. In particular, the MAFF/WOAD Soil Code provides farmers with comprehensive advice about the impact of agricultural practices on soil condition. This includes advice on preventing or minimising erosion. In addition, this Department published an advisory booklet during 1997, "Controlling Soil Erosion", which gave farmers further help in dealing with soil erosion problems.

The Department has also commissioned a step by step guide to help farmers plan erosion control systematically. The draft guide will be trailed over the winter in certain areas of England with soils at high risk of erosion by water.

Olestra

Ms Keeble: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning the licensing of the dietary additive Olestra. [21001]

Mr. Rooker: A number of representations have been received recently from branches of the Standing Conference of Women's Organisations asking for Olestra to be restricted to medical use only.

This fat replacer cannot, however, be used as a food ingredient in Europe until such time as it has been approved under the EC Novel Foods Regulation (258/97). To date, no application for approval of Olestra under this regulation has been received.

Krebs Report

Mrs. Browning: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he will make a statement on the outcome of the Krebs report. [21099]

Mr. Rooker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) on 16 December 1997, Official Report, columns 136–37.

Fishing

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food at which meetings of the fisheries and management committees were (a) proposals and (b) decisions made relating to the minimum size of legally caught plaice; and for what purposes these proposals and decisions were made. [20970]

Mr. Morley: A proposal to revise the minimum landing size for legally caught plaice was made by the European Commission in June 1996 as part of a package of technical conservation measures. The size of 17 cm proposed was that at which plaice are retained and killed by 80 mm nets. The revised minimum size was intended to reduce the discarding of dead fish that could not otherwise be landed.

On 30 October 1997, the Fisheries Council decided to increase the minimum size from 17 cm to 22 cm as part of a compromise package. This new size will apply from 1 January 2000 and is intended to take account of the fact that plaice are often targeted with nets exceeding 80 mm minimum mesh size.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the (a) discards and (b) legally landed catches for each member state of the European Union in (i) tonnes and (ii) numbers of fish in each of the years 1992 to 1996. [20971]

Mr. Morley: Data on discarding are not generally available and specific information is not reported by Member States. For information on catches, I refer my hon. Friend to my answer given to him today. No data are collected on numbers of fish landed.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the approximate weight and value of (a) the total fish catch of member states of the European Community, (b) fish consumption by member states, (c) total imports of fish from third nations and (d) exports of fish to third nations in each year from 1990 to 1996; and for each year what percentage (a) was of (b). [20972]

Mr. Morley: The available information, which has been produced by the Food and Agriculture Organisation (FAO) of the United Nations and Eurostat, is set out in the tables.

For parts (a) and (b) data have been given for years 1990 to 1995; data for 1996 are currently unavailable from FAO.

Data are given for all years even though not all the current 15 Member States have been part of the European Community for the whole of this period.

The information requested relating to the value of the total fish catch of Member States of the European Community and fish consumption by Member States is not available.

Sea Defences

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if his Department plans to reduce the proportion of sea defence expenditure funded by public funds. [21030]

Mr. Morley: Allocations for MAFF grants and credit approvals to operating authorities for capital flood and coastal defence works in 1998–99 are at the same level as plans proposed last year by the previous Government. Also, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has recently announced that Revenue Support Grant allocations for 1998–99, which cover residual costs of local authorities' schemes that are not covered by grant aid, will be almost 5.1 per cent. higher than actual expenditure in 1997–98. For future years the level of funding will depend on the outcome of the Comprehensive Spending Review.

International Fund for Animal Welfare

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what financial support his Department (a) has given and (b) plans to give to IFAW. [21028]

Mr. Morley: None.

BSE

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the development by Enfer Scientific of a test for BSE antibodies in tissue samples taken from dead animals. [21845]

Mr. Rooker: We have asked this company if they would provide us with sufficient technical information to enable us to assess the test, but they have so far declined to do so. We continue to be in contact with them and hope that they will feel able to provide us with the necessary information in future.

Waste Cattle Bones

Mrs. May: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice his Department has given to butchers and local authorities responsible for waste collection on the disposal of waste cattle bones from butchers' shops following the ban on the sale of beef on the bone. [21139]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 16 December 1997]: In response to inquiries from butchers and local authorities, the Department's officials have advised that bones are not classified as Specified Risk Material (SRM) under the Beef Bones Regulations 1997, and can be disposed of in accordance with Part II of Schedule I to the Animal By Products Order 1992. Arrangements for actual disposal are a commercial matter between individual butchers and those who collect their waste.

Animal Carcases

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the backlog of animal carcases awaiting incineration; and what action the Government are taking under the Over Thirty Months Scheme to expedite the processing. [21497]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 18 December 1997]: There is no backlog of the Over Thirty Months Scheme (OTMS) carcases awaiting incineration. On average 15,000 animals a week are presented for the scheme, of which around 1,500 cattle, mostly on-farm casualties, are directly incinerated in appropriately authorised incinerators. The remainder are rendered and the remains securely stored pending disposal. Following a tender held last year, the amount of direct carcase incineration capacity available to the scheme is expected to increase to around 5,000 animals a week by spring 1998, subject to the successful companies obtaining the necessary planning and environmental consents. Much of this increase will be in respect of incinerators that are associated with scheme abattoirs, thus providing an integrated disposal solution.

Beef

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what external advice he sought when SEAC's recommendations were first notified to him. [21610]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 18 December 1997]: When SEAC's advice was notified to my right hon. Friend, and having taken into account the views of the Chief Medical Officer, he announced his intention to consult widely on proposals to prohibit the sale of beef on the bone from animals aged over six months. My right hon. Friend has received a large number of comments which were taken into account before he introduced legislation in this House.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Schools

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the voluntary grammar schools which have preparatory departments; and if she will make a statement on the enrolments of these preparatory departments at each school. [20696]

Mr. Worthington: Nineteen of Northern Ireland's 54 voluntary grammar schools have preparatory departments. The most recent year for which enrolment figures are available is 1996–97 and the table shows the enrolment figure at each school.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the costs of the current DENI capital building programme for (a) the controlled, (b) the maintained, (c) the integrated and (d) the voluntary grammar school sector; and in each case if she will list the approved schemes and their values. [21032]

Mr. Worthington: The details of my Department's major capital building programme are set out in the table. In addition, four school projects are being pursued under the Private Finance Initiative—St. Genevieve's High School, Wellington College, Balmoral High School (all Belfast) and Drumglass High School, Dungannon. The estimated capital cost of these projects is just over £31 million.

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the funding of administration costs of the Council for Catholic Maintained Schools will be subject to the same economies and constraints as are applicable to the headquarters costs of education and library boards. [21265]

Mr. Worthington: The administration costs of the Council will be subject to economies and constraints but the level of constraint will be determined after consideration of the Council's individual circumstances.

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the controlled primary schools in the North Down constituency, specifying in each case the spare capacity in terms of pupil numbers. [21424]

Mr. Worthington: The following controlled primary schools are within the North Down constituency:

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans she has to consult parents concerning preparatory schooling funding; and if she will make a statement on the consultation undertaken and the amount of correspondence received to date. [21426]

Mr. Worthington: A consultative letter was issued on 8 October to all schools with preparatory departments. It was then a matter for each school to consult with and take the views of parents. The Department of Education has to date received approximately 900 responses during the consultation process.

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what percentage of preparatory school pupils attend establishments that are not categorised as Catholic for fair employment statistical purposes. [21425]

Mr. Worthington: 100 per cent.

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what account was taken of the Policy Appraisal and Fair Treatment guidelines in the decision to review Preparatory Department funding; and if she will make a statement. [21427]

Mr. Worthington: A Policy Appraisal and Fair Treatment analysis will be carried out concurrent with the analysis of all the comments received during the consultation process. This analysis will be an integral part of the final decision-making process.

Cottonmount Landfill Site

Kate Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what are the implications of phase 2 of the Cottonmount landfill site for re-cycling measures in Northern Ireland; [20783]

(2) if an environmental impact study was carried out on phase 1 of the Cottonmount landfill site; [20786]

(3) if an environmental impact study will be carried out before any decision is taken on phase 2 of the Cottonmount landfill site; [20787]

(4) to what extent she will take the draft EC Directive on the Landfill of Waste into account before a decision on phase 2 of the Cottonmount landfill site is made; [20788]

(5) if the minimum separation distance from site boundaries to residential and recreational areas of phase 2 of Cottonmount landfill site is less than the draft EC directive's general requirements; [20782]

(6) what assessment she has made of the Newtownabbey Borough Council independent environmental study into the effects of phase 1 of Cottonmount landfill site on local residents. [20784]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Planning Service under its chief executive, Mr. T. W. Stewart. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from T. W. Stewart to Kate Hoey, dated 19 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the Cottonmount landfill site at Mallusk Belfast.

There are no direct implications of Phase 2 of the Cottonmount landfill site for recycling measures in Northern Ireland. The new Waste Management and Contaminated Land (NI) Order 1997 includes a requirement that a Northern Ireland Waste Strategy be prepared. Work is already under way on the Strategy which will inter alia promote the hierarchy of waste management options which range from waste minimisation, through re-cycling to landfill at the bottom of the list. The recycling measures which flow from the Order together with the landfill tax all mitigate against landfill. However, there is likely to be an on-going need for landfill sites for materials which are not recyclable and, for example, residues from incineration.

The application to landfill Phase 1 of the Cottonmount site was submitted on 31 May 1988 prior to the introduction of the Planning (Assessment of Environmental Effects) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1989 on 1 March 1989. A formal environmental statement could not therefore have been sought for that application. An environmental statement was requested, submitted and carefully considered with the current application for Phase 2 prior to the Notice of Opinion to approve issuing.

The EC Directive has been in preparation for a number of years and a previous draft was rejected by the European Parliament in May 1996. Article 18 of the EC directive states that Member States shall bring into force the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with this Directive before 30 June 2000. While the draft EC Directive is a material consideration, only limited cognisance can be taken of it.

Annex 1 of the draft Directive states that the separation distance from the boundary of the site to residential areas should be a minimum of 500 metres in the case of municipal waste landfills and 2 kilometres in the case of hazardous waste landfills. In Phase 2 of the Cottonmount site residential and recreation areas are closer to the boundary than currently stated in the draft EC Directive.

Newtownabbey Borough Council has appointed independent consultants to consider the landfilling practices of the operators and to investigate particularly the causes of odours generated by Phase 1 of Cottonmount. As work on the study has not yet commenced no account can be taken of it. The Department however, consulted Newtownabbey Borough Council for advice on the environmental health issues when processing the current application and took account of the advice when reaching an opinion as to how the application should be determined.

I hope this clarifies the position.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Visas

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many applications for visitors visas to the United Kingdom were received in the last 12 months at Lagos; and how many of these applications were refused. [21332]

Mr. Fatchett: The number of applications for visitors visas to the United Kingdom and number of applications refused in Lagos in the last 12 months were:

Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many infringements of Cyprus air-space by Turkish military aircraft have been reported in 1997 to date; and if he will make a statement. [21397]

Mr. Doug Henderson: We have no independent statistics on infringements. We continue to support efforts to encourage the parties involved to agree a sustained moratorium on military overflights.

Turkey

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the British Government conduct their relationship with Turkey on the basis that it is their policy to support Turkey in its application to be a member state of the European Union. [21705]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Our relationship with Turkey is conducted on the basis that Turkey is a candidate to join the EU; that major changes (including in the human rights field) will be required before accession negotiations can begin; but that, if over time the necessary wide-ranging reforms are made, we will welcome Turkey into the EU.

DEFENCE

Low Pay

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the hourly rates payable to full-time employees in his Department in the range £4.03 an hour to £3.36 an hour; and how many people receive each hourly rate of pay as specified, in each region defined by the regional government offices. [20606]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 15 December 1997]: Details of the pay rates of most MOD staff are not held by geographical area. The table therefore shows the total number of staff (all non-industrials) receiving the hourly rates of pay specified across the department as a whole.

In the case of the Armed Forces, pay is based on recommendations made by the independent Armed Forces Pay Review Body (AFPRB) and published annually. The 1997 AFPRB Report (Cmnd 3537) is in the Library. The Armed Forces pay is based on daily, not hourly rates, with no regional variations in basic pay.

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 2 December 1997, Official Report, column 177, if he will list by regions defined by the regional government offices, the number of civilian staff paid at an hourly rate of (a) £3.36, (b) between £3.50 and £3.75 and (c) between £3.75 and £4. [20653]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 15 December 1997]: Details of the pay rates of MOD non-industrial staff are not held by geographical area. The following list below therefore shows the total number of staff (all non-industrials) in the specified bands across the department as a whole.

£3.50–3.75: 857

£3.76–4.00: 661.

Smart Procurement

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the working parties he has established on smart procurement through the National Defence Industries Council, including the terms of reference on each one, its chairman and members together with their companies or organisations; and when each working party (a) first met and (b) will report to Ministers. [21125]

Mr. Spellar: There are no NDIC groups dealing solely with Smart Procurement. However, following the meeting of the NDIC on 17 July a sub group was established and tasked with producing a paper reflecting industry's views on industrial aspects of the Strategic Defence Review, including Smart Procurement.

The Strategic Defence Review Sub Group formally met for the first time on 24 September. This meeting was chaired by Deputy Chief of Defence Procurement (Support).

The Strategic Defence Review Sub Group presented the results of their work to ministers at the NDIC meeting on 29 October.

The trade associations represented on the sub group are the Defence Industries Council, the Defence Manufacturers Association, the British Naval Equipment Association, the Federation of Electronics Industries, and the Society of British Aerospace Companies.

A wide range of companies were also represented including BAe, Cobham, Fairey Hydraulics, Rolls-Royce, FR Aviation, GKN, Racal, Smith's Industries, Computing Devices (UK), GEC, GEC-Marconi, TI/Messier-Dowty and Vickers.

Defence Industry

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the policy framework within which the United Kingdom defence industry can make decisions on how to restructure. [21127]

Mr. Spellar: It is for defence companies themselves to take the lead on determining the future structure of the industry. However, we recognise that Governments, who are the only legitimate buyers of defence equipment, can have a major constructive influence. Accordingly, the UK, France and Germany have been working together to set a baseline position for the restructuring of the European aerospace and defence industries. These discussions culminated in the issue of a statement by the three Heads of Government on 9 December. The clear message of the statement is that the three Governments, whose industries form the bulk of the European defence industrial base, are now working together to facilitate the process of change.

A programme of work to resolve practical issues falling mainly within the sphere of Defence Ministers has been agreed and is being taken forward by the National Armaments Directors of the three nations.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with (a) United Kingdom defence companies, (b) foreign-owned defence companies based in the United Kingdom, (c) foreign defence companies, (d) foreign governments and (e) the European Commission on the Government's role in facilitating international agreements to allow mergers or joint ventures to proceed. [21126]

Mr. Spellar: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence meets a wide range of defence companies, both UK and foreign, on a regular basis. Where appropriate, discussions at these meetings cover defence industry restructuring and the Government's role in facilitating this.

The Governments of the UK, France and Germany have been working together to establish a baseline position for the restructuring of the European aerospace and defence industries. These discussions culminated in the issue of a statement by the three heads of Government on 9 December.

There have been no discussions as yet with the European Commission.

Royal Ordnance, Bridgwater

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the future of Royal Ordnance, Bridgwater. [21123]

Mr. Spellar: The production of military explosives at Royal Ordnance, Bridgwater would cease if Royal Ordnance plc and the French company Société Nationale des Poudres et Explosifs (SNPE) were to form the joint venture that the companies have expressed an intention of forming in the field of ammunition and military explosives.

If pursued, such a joint venture would need to be considered by the appropriate regulatory authorities and in consultation with the French Government. The strategic implications of any proposal would be examined with great care as part of that consideration.

Anti-personnel Mines

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the future anti-personnel scatterable mine project. [21570]

Mr. Spellar: On 3 December, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development signed the Ottawa Convention which will ban the use, stockpiling, import, export, transfer and manufacture of anti-personnel mines. Accordingly, the United Kingdom will not procure any new anti-personnel mines; we will therefore not proceed with the Future Anti-Personnel Scatterable Mine project.

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if there has been any modification of the contract to supply 29 volcano vehicle launched scatterable mine systems and associated equipment and munitions, due to enter service in 1999; and if he will make a statement. [21571]

Mr. Spellar: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Eurofighter

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will assess the effect on the overseas sales potential of Eurofighter of the questions put to the Minister for Defence Procurement by the BBC at the Dubai Air Show and broadcast on "Panorama".

Mr. Spellar: None. As my noble Friend made clear at Dubai, the Eurofighter programme is proceeding well and the aircraft has significant export potential.

SCOTLAND

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if his Department's estimates of the total costs of resolving the millennium compliance problem include costs relating to the embedded chip problem; and if he will make a statement. [21569]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 18 December 1997]: My Department's estimates of the total costs of resolving the millennium compliance problem do not specifically include costs relating to the embedded chip problem. However, initial investigative work suggests that these costs are unlikely to be substantial and can be met from within existing budgets.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what millennium compliance problems have occurred to date in his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) other public bodies; and if he will make a statement. [21568]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 18 December 1997]: To date there have been no reported millennium compliance problems in my Department or its Agencies. Action by other public bodies in Scotland is a matter for them as separate corporate entities, although my Department monitors Year 2000 compliance activity in the public sector in Scotland generally; no compliance problems have been reported to date. My Department has taken steps to ensure that public sector organisations in Scotland are aware of the actions necessary to address the problem and will continue to monitor progress.

HEALTH

Tobacco Consumption

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by what percentage tobacco consumption in the United Kingdom has changed up to 1996 since (i) 1975, (ii) 1978, (iii) 1990 and (iv) 1993. [19707]

Ms Jowell: Information about cigarettes released for home consumption in the United Kingdom is shown in the table. The data include home produced and imported cigarettes, but exclude cigars, hand rolling tobacco and other tobacco products.

Speech Impediments

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of people in the United Kingdom who are (a) physically unable to speak and (b) have serious speech impediment. [19657]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 8 December 1997]: Estimates of this kind vary because of the wide range of conditions involved and the different criteria used. However, a study by Enderby and Davies (1989) suggested that the number of individuals unable to speak or with significant difficulty in doing so may be classified as follows:

	Per 100,000 population
Cerebral Palsy	20
Parkinson's Disease	23
Multiple Sclerosis	10
Muscular Dystrophy	2
Motor Neurone Disease	1.2
Myasthenia Gravis	0.5
Huntingdon's Chorea	0.2
Friedrich's Syndrome	0.7

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of general practitioner fundholders have purchased communication aids for use by people physically unable to speak in the last year. [19659]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 8 December 1997]: General practitioner fundholders have been able to purchase communication aids for their patients since 1995. They were also given a leaflet containing expert advice on the subject at this time. We do not have information about the percentage of them who have purchased these aids.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people who are (a) physically unable to speak and (b) have serious speech impediments have been provided with a communication aid by the National Health Service in the last year. [19658]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 8 December 1997]: The number of communication aids provided is not collected centrally. The Department has sought to reduce the burden of data collection on the National Health Service and the collection of additional information of this kind would not be in line with this policy.

Tobacco Sponsorship

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what criteria determined his choice of the Minister for Public Health to lead the Tobacco Review. [16746]

Mr. Dobson: My hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health is responsible for policy on tobacco. Work on the Tobacco Review forms part of these duties.

Public Health

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the Government's plans for taking forward European Union public health issues during the forthcoming United Kingdom presidency of the EU. [22251]

Ms Jowell: The Government's main priority in the public health sphere during the United Kingdom Presidency of the European Union will be to demonstrate the practical relevance of the EU in promoting better health.

There is already a substantial agenda for the Health Council which will meet on 30 April 1998 and which I shall chair. The main topics for the Health Council during the UK Presidency will be:

Communicable diseases

The European Parliament is due to adopt in January its opinion on the Council's common position on the proposal to establish a Community network for the surveillance of communicable diseases. The UK Presidency will seek to reach agreement on a final version of the decision. We will also arrange for the Council to review progress by the European Union–United States task force which is considering how to establish a global network for communicable disease surveillance.

Tobacco

The UK Presidency will take forward as appropriate any new proposals for the Community action which the Commission may bring forward to follow up its communication on combating tobacco consumption. The European Parliament will be considering the Council's common position on the proposal for a Directive banning tobacco advertising and the UK Presidency will stand ready to facilitate adoption of a final version of the Directive.

Rare diseases, pollution-related diseases and injury prevention

The UK Presidency hopes that the European Parliament will deliver its opinion on these three proposals for new public health programmes in time for the Council to adopt common positions at the Health Council meeting on 30 April.

Screening of blood donors and donations

We will take forward consideration of the Commission's proposal for a Council recommendation on the screening of blood donors and donations. Although a recommendation is not binding on Member States, its adoption will signal their commitment to coordinate measures across the EU to secure blood safety.

Transmissible Spongiform Encephalopathies (TSEs)

The UK Presidency will ensure the Council keeps under review developments in understanding of the causes and routes of transmission of the agent responsible for new variant Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease.

Discussion on the future of public health in the EU

The UK Presidency hopes to hold a discussion on Community action in the field of public health after 2001 taking into account the new European Treaty agreed in Amsterdam in June, should this be ratified, and the forthcoming enlargement of the Union.

The discussion could also focus on how Health Ministers of the 15 EU Member States might establish effective working relationships with the countries of Central and Eastern Europe and Cyprus to ensure that public health policy matters are properly considered in their plans to join the European Union so that an enlarged Union is able to continue to provide a high level of health protection for its citizens. In this context, the Council would clearly need to take account of the work already being done in the field of public health by the World Health Organisation and in particular its European Region and by the Council of Europe.

The Government also intend using opportunities outside the formal EU institutional framework to raise the profile of the EU public health agenda and to consider how it can contribute in practical ways to better public health across the Union. The Department of Health is discussing with, among others, the British Medical Association and the Royal college of Nursing about conferences planned for the UK Presidency to build on the discussions started in the Health Council about the future of public health in the EU in the next century. These events will provide further evidence of the Government's determination to demonstrate how the EU public health machinery can be made to work towards achieving a better quality of life for the people of Europe.

Primary Care Data

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if primary care will continue to receive funding to collect activity data. [21362]

Mr. Milburn: Primary Care Groups will receive financial support to fulfil their management functions.

Payment for data collection beyond normal primary care duties will continue to be considered on a case by case basis.

"The New NHS"

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to paragraph 5.19 of the White Paper "The New NHS" (Cm 3807) how the prescribing budget will relate to the unified budget; and if he will make a statement on the setting of the budget. [21363]

Mr. Milburn: The prescribing budget will form one of the elements within the unified budget, but the Primary Care Group will be able to choose how its total budget is deployed, and no individual element will be artificially capped.

All elements of the health authority's and Primary Care Group's unified budget will have fair, target, shares set by a weighted capitation formula. Practice level prescribing budgets will be set using similar methodologies to those used now.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what will be the impact of proposals in the White Paper "The New NHS" (Cm 3807) on the numbers of health authorities in isolated areas. [21365]

Mr. Milburn: We expect to see fewer health authorities covering larger areas. As the White Paper makes clear, however, there will be no central blueprint for health authority mergers: local decision rather than national edict will determine the numbers and location of health authorities.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the impact of the proposals contained in the White Paper "The New NHS" (Cm 3807) on geographical equity of access to (a) fertility treatments, (b) contraception and (c) abortion services. [21366]

Ms Jowell: The White Paper "The New NHS" outlines a number of steps which the Government will be taking to improve the consistency of service provision throughout the National Health Service. We will challenge and address variations which are not based on the health needs and wishes of local people. We will aim for maximum consistency while still allowing appropriate local and individual responsiveness.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to paragraph 3.9 of the White Paper "The New NHS" (Cm 3807) if the single unified budget will be capped. [21367]

Mr. Milburn: Yes. Primary Care Groups which take devolved responsibility for the single unified budget will be responsible for managing services within a cash limit, as health authorities and general practitioner fundholders currently are.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to the White Paper "The New NHS" (Cm 3807) how freedom of referral according to patient need and choice will be maintained. [21370]

Mr. Milburn: The White Paper "The New NHS" (Cm 3807) is fully consistent with general practitioners' freedom of referral. Primary Care Groups will be able to develop long term agreements with National Health Service trusts that reflect the views of all local GPs and are sensitive to their referral choices. The arrangements to replace the internal market system of extra contractual referrals, substituting adjustments to allocations for the former bureaucratic invoicing system, will cover the freedom to refer outside these agreements in special cases, combining the freedom to refer with the ability to fund.

NHS Direct

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what procedures will be followed in circumstances where the advice given by the proposed 24-hour telephone advice line, NHS Direct, is contrary to advice given by other 24-hour services funded by his Department. [21364]

Mr. Boateng: Advice from the National Health Service Direct 24-hour telephone advice lines will have the same status as any other clinical advice in the NHS. NHS Direct will be staffed by qualified nurses trained in giving telephone advice and who will have access to medical support when needed.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health where the legal responsibility for advice given over the proposed 24-hour telephone advice line will lie. [21368]

Mr. Boateng: National Health Service bodies providing the NHS Direct advice lines will have a duty of care towards callers, as they do towards the users of the other services they provide.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health from which budget the resources to fund the proposed 24-hour telephone advice line will come. [21369]

Mr. Boateng: The three pilot helplines, due to start in March 1998, will be funded centrally. Decisions about the longer term funding of the National Health Service Direct-24 hour telephone advice lines will be made in due course when the pilots have been evaluated.

Dental Services

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy not to implement the regulations which reduce from 24 months to 15 months the dental registration period. [21645]

Mr. Milburn: The National Health Service (General Dental Services) Amendment (No. 2) Regulation 1996 SI 1996/2051, which implemented the changes to the registration period, were laid before Parliament on 6 August 1996, and came into force on 1 September 1996.

We have no plans to review this policy, which will improve value for money by focusing payments to dentists on those patients receiving active care from them.

Any savings generated will be put back into the General Dental Service, in a targeted way to achieve better oral health for the population.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the numbers of people who will be deregistered from dentists' lists in 1998 as a consequence of the implementation of the regulations reducing the dental registration period from 24 months to 15 months. [21647]

Mr. Milburn: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 24 November 1997, Official Report, column 423.

NHS (50th Anniversary)

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funds will be made available to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the National Health Service; and if he will ensure that the maximum proportion of such funds is used in ways which promote patient care. [21703]

Mr. Milburn: Ministers have decided that the special occasion of the 50th Anniversary of the National Health Service should be marked with events and initiatives that reflect the Service's achievements and, equally important, herald its further development over the coming years. The Service has been issued with guidance that emphasises that the main focus should be at local level, with the active participation of staff and patients, and should reflect the caring ethos of the Health Service.

The guidance also emphasises that events should be low cost, sponsored or self financing so that resources are not diverted from patient care.

Resource Allocation

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will ensure that the new Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation introduces a factor to take account of particular problems faced by islands. [21371]

Mr. Milburn: We have asked the Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation to consider whether further investigation in this area would be useful.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what criteria the Government use to measure the adequacy of NHS funding. [21372]

Mr. Milburn: The Government have made a commitment in our election manifesto to raise spending on the National Health Service in real terms every year so that we can deliver our manifesto commitments and produce a health service that is modern and dependable.

Chronic Fatigue Syndrome

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funding the Government have allocated to research into Chronic Fatigue Syndrome; and if he will make a statement. [21433]

Mr. Boateng: Priorities for funding research in the Department are set very carefully, based on the burden of disease and other criteria. Bids for conducting research into chronic fatigue syndrome (CFS)/myalgic encephalomyelitis (ME) are therefore always considered on that basis. The Department continues to fund research into the management and treatment of CFS/ME through the National Health Service Research and Development Programme. It is currently funding an on-going research project, costing about £60,000, which is looking at whether general practitioners are best placed to manage CFS/ME patients. A recently completed research project, costing over £65,000, considered whether a particular type of psychological treatment was effective in reducing disability in CFS/ME patients. The main agency through which the Government support medical and clinical research is the Medical Research Council. The Council currently provides support for one Small Project Grant in the area of Chronic Fatigue Syndrome entitled "The role of noradrenaline in the neuropsychological pathogenesis of the chronic fatigue syndrome". The total amount awarded was £37,000.

University Hospital, Birmingham

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what estimate he has made of the levels of bed occupancy in the University Hospital Trust PFI scheme in Birmingham; [21428]

(2) what is the forecast case mix of the new University Hospital Trust PFI scheme in Birmingham; [21430]

(3) if he will estimate (a) the capital cost and (b) the revenue cost of the new PFI scheme at University Hospital Trust in Birmingham. [21432]

Mr. Milburn: No Private Finance Initiative scheme has been submitted by the University Hospital Birmingham Trust to the Department of Health at this time.

Dr. Brand: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what factors underlie the acute bed admission assumptions made by the University Hospital Trust in Birmingham for the next year. [21429]

Mr. Milburn: Assumptions will be based on projected activity resulting from contracts placed by health authorities and general practitioners with the University Hospital Birmingham NHS Trust which will decide what level of services will be required for next year. It is anticipated that activity will be broadly the same as this year.

Dr. Brand: to ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the number of acute beds at the University Hospital Trust in Birmingham for (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000. [21431]

Mr. Milburn: There are currently 1,100 beds in the University Hospital Birmingham NHS Trust. There are no plans to alter this number significantly. There may be fluctuations around 1,100 either up or down based on the time of year or commissioning requirements.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Ozone Layer

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress has been made in assisting developing countries to phase out substances that deplete the ozone layer; and if she will make a statement. [22065]

Clare Short: The Executive Committee of the Multilateral Fund for the Implementation of the Montreal Protocol had its 23rd meeting on 12–14 November. The meeting, chaired by the UK, allocated US$109 million to projects assisting developing countries in phasing out ozone-depleting substances. In total, 259 phase-out activities were approved in 45 developing countries.

Most significantly, the Committee approved a US$62 million project to phase out 99 per cent. of halon production and consumption in China by 2006, four years in advance of Protocol requirements. The remaining one per cent. will be phased out by 2010. As halons are the most potent of all ozone-depleting substances, this represents a major step to protect the stratospheric ozone layer.

The Multilateral Fund totals US$1 billion in commitments to the end of 1999. The UK is the fifth largest donor and committed almost US$50 million in the period 1991–97.

Development Council

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the outcome of the European Union Development Council Meeting on 28 November. [22069]

Clare Short: Ministers held further discussions on the future of EC trade and development relations with the African, Caribbean and Pacific (ACP) States. The Council agreed one Resolution, on the use of micro-finance programmes as a development tool. The Council also adopted a set of procedural Conclusions, on the Information Society and Development, which set out further work the Commission proposes to do in the area to ensure that within developing countries the benefits from new technologies are shared by all. The Council also discussed and agreed in principle to the extension of the current Food Aid Convention for one year, until 30 June 1999, in order that a new revised Convention can be drawn up. There were exchanges of views on two subjects; the first on the follow-up to the Gender Resolution of 1995, the second covered follow-up to the Conclusions on Linking Relief, Rehabilitation and Development.

Eight items were raised under any other business. As they were AOB points, there were no formal conclusions. However, there was a useful discussion on the 1996 DAC Report on EC development assistance. The humanitarian situation in the Great Lakes Region in Africa and the coming Friends of Congo meeting were also discussed.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Open Government

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the total number of releases under the open government initiative. [22474]

Dr. David Clark: The latest number of records released under the Open Government Initiative now stands at over 85,000 and relates to releases up to the end of September 1997. This represents an increase of about 9 per cent. over the previous total of over 77,500, which was announced by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Office of Public Service in the adjournment debate on Freedom of Information on 9 July 1997, Official Report, columns 902–10, and related the total figure as at the end of March 1997.

Public Records

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the 10 oldest sets of public records which have not been released. [21252]

Dr. David Clark: I am advised that the oldest records held by the Public Record Office which have not been released are 27 volumes of boxes of Enrolled Deposited Leases, and associated documents, of the Office of Land Revenue Records and Enrolments, dating partly or wholly from before 1900. For information on the oldest public records retained in Government Departments I refer my hon. Friend to answers given in response to a question by the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker), Official Report, 8 July 1997, columns 391, 393, 394, 421, 425, 428, 436, 449 and 463; 9 July 1997, columns 471–2 and 485; 10 July 1997, columns 555, 573 and 614; 17 July 1997, column 275.

Admiralty House

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list those Government Ministers with apartments in Admiralty House; if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer of providing this accommodation to Ministers; what factors require Ministers to occupy these apartments; and if he will set out the basis on which they have been allocated to individual Ministers. [21760]

Dr. David Clark: The following Ministers are currently occupying apartments in Admiralty house:

Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions

President of the Board of Trade

Secretary of State for Defence

The cost to the Exchequer for 1996–97, the last full year for which figures are available was £407,300.

Under long-standing arrangements, the allocation of these apartments is in the gift of the Prime Minister.

Civil Servants

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will take steps to provide financial assistance to women formerly employed in the Civil Service who lost their pension entitlement as a result of being paid lump-sum gratuities from their accumulated pension contributions at their time of leaving; and if he will make a statement. [22106]

Dr. David Clark: I have no plans to change the rules that applied to women who resigned their established appointments before 1 June 1972 on marriage and received a gratuity.

Until civil service pension arrangements were changed in 1972, the general rule was that anybody who resigned from an established, that is, a pensionable post, before reaching age 50 automatically lost all eligibility for superannuation benefits in respect of their pre-resignation service. That eligibility could not be restored even if the person concerned subsequently returned to the service and became established and pensionable again.

The arrangements for marriage gratuities for women who married while serving in an established post were an exception to this general rule. A women who received a marriage gratuity and who later returned to pensionable service in the civil service had opportunity, subject to the time limits which applied, to refund the gratuity and count her earlier service for the purpose of any superannuation award for which she subsequently became eligible.

Any change in these arrangements would on fairness grounds also have to extend to former civil servants who resigned for other reasons from their established appointments before 1972 and who did not qualify for pension benefits. It is rarely, if ever, possible to make retrospective changes in pension arrangements.

Non-departmental Public Bodies

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what has been the change in the number of non-departmental public bodies since 2 May; [21792]

(2) if he will list the new non-departmental public bodies which have been (a) announced and (b) set up since 2 May; [21790]

(3) if he will list the non-departmental public bodies which have been abolished since 2 May. [21791]

Dr. David Clark: Since 2 May, the total number of non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) has fallen by nine. The Government are committed to keeping the number of NDPBs to a minimum and Ministers are currently examining the NDPBs they sponsor with a view to identifying further candidates for abolition.

The following table lists those bodies which have been classified as NDPBs and established since 2 May 1997, as well as those NDPBs which have been abolished or where proposals for abolition have been announced. The table also lists a number of new NDPBs that the Government are proposing to set up. Many of these new bodies will be essential in helping the Government to deliver its manifesto commitments.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Post Marks

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what representations she has received relating to alterations in the post marks appearing on House of Commons mail. [21654]

Mrs. Roe: I have received one representation relating to alterations in the postmarks appearing on House of Commons mail. This has been from the hon. Member.

I understand that, on occasions when the machine in the Royal Mail sorting office at Nine Elms which applies the House of Commons frank to mail from the Parliamentary Estate has failed, a franking machine which applies an SW1 frank has been used in order to prevent delays. I am advised that arrangements are now in place for an alternative machine to apply the House of Commons frank under these circumstances.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Wills

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what national arrangements exist for the public registration of an individual's (a) will, prior to death, (b) enduring power of attorney and (c) advance directive. [20969]

Mr. Hoon: I can confirm that no national arrangements exist for the public registration of an individual's will prior to death. However, my hon. Friend may be interested to know that The Council of Europe Convention on the Establishment of a Scheme of Registration of Wills was signed by the United Kingdom on 16 May 1972. Each contracting state was required to set up a scheme whereby a limited category of wills must be registered in that state, and may be registered in any other contracting state. Sections 23–28 of the Administration of Justice Act 1982 were introduced to enable the UK to ratify the Convention. However, the relevant sections of the Act have not been brought into force.

Section 4(1) of the Enduring Power of Attorney Act 1985 imposes upon the Attorney a duty to apply to register the Power with the Court of Protection when he or she has reason to believe that the Donor is or is becoming mentally incapable. The Court maintains a register of such cases.

On payment of a fee any person is entitled to request the Court to search the register and say whether an Enduring Power of Attorney has been registered. The Court may supply any person with an office copy of the Power if it is satisfied that he has a good reason for requesting a copy and cannot reasonably obtain one from the Attorney.

While the Donor remains capable there is no obligation for the Attorney to apply for registration. There is no central register held in respect of these Powers.

There is no national arrangement in existence for the public registration of an individual's advance directive. Those making advance directives should let people close to them know of their decisions.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the cost to public funds of the libel case brought by Mr. Jonathan Aitken against The Guardian newspaper. [21259]

Mr. Hoon: The libel case brought by Jonathan Aitken was heard for 13 days by a High Court Judge. The daily cost of hearing a High Court case is £982.58, which includes the cost of the judge, administrative assistance and courtroom accommodation. The cost of a 13 day trial is therefore £12,773.54. However, Jonathan Aitken paid £150 in court fees and therefore the total cost to public funds of this case is £12,623.54.

Legal Aid (Personal Injury)

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was total expenditure on legal aid in relation to personal injury actions for the three most recent years for which figures are available; and how much in each year can be attributed to (a) medical negligence cases and (b) other cases, indicating each type of case. [21695]

Mr. Hoon: Net expenditure from the legal aid fund in respect of personal injury litigation in cases closed in the last three years, by category of case, was as follows:

£ million

	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97
Medical negligence	23.9	26.9	27.2
Accidents at work	8.1	10.7	13.7
Running down	4.2	5.2	5.8
Other personal injury	8.2	12.4	15.1
Total personal injury	44.4	52.2	61.8

CABINET OFFICE

Millennium Exhibition

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio what contingency plans he has made in respect of time and cost overruns for the Millennium Exhibition. [21120]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company's overall cash budget of £758 million, which was approved by the Government during the June review and by the Millennium Commission as the basis for its grant, includes a cost contingency of £88 million. This contingency is managed centrally within the Company to ensure tight control over its allocation and use. Both cost and time issues are the subject of comprehensive and regular review at Executive and Board level. I am satisfied that the NMEC's management and control systems are thorough and comprehensive and enable early identification and correction of potential cost or time overruns. The project is currently to time and to budget.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio for what reasons the Advisory Committee on Advertising was not consulted over the appointment of M and C Saatchi in respect of the Millennium Experience. [21117]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company is not aware of any requirement to consult the Advisory Committee. The NMEC considers that the Selection Panel who interviewed the short-listed companies afford the requisite level of expertise and experience in this field. The panel comprised: Mr. Michael Grade, NMEC Board member and Chairman of First Leisure Corporation Plc; Mr. Ian Ash, NMEC Board member and Corporate Relations Director British Telecom; Ms Jennie Page, Chief Executive NMEC: Mr. Kevin Johnson, then Commercial Director Designate of NMEC.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio (1) how much private sector money has now been pledged in sponsorship for the Millennium Exhibition; [21021]

(2) how much money has been raised for the Millennium Exhibition by the International Management Group. [21263]

Mr. Mandelson: The right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) chaired a meeting of potential sponsors in June 1996 and laid the foundations for establishing significant private sector interest. That interest is being intensively followed up. Public commitments have been made by British Airways, British Telecom and the Corporation of London. Others will be announced in the New Year.

The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) and IMG are now in the process of detailed and sensitive negotiations with a range of other national and international companies. These discussions have been given added impetus following the NMEC's announcement, in early December, that 11 designers are under contract to develop further the Millennium Experience's content. The NMEC and IMG can now consider with potential sponsors how particular aspects of content can be shaped to meet their commercial requirements while at the same time ensuring the integrity of the Experience.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Minister without Portfolio (1) how many people will make up the junior board for the Millennium Experience; what it will do; how it will be chosen; and what its budget will be; [21013]

(2) if he will make a statement on his plans for a junior board or junior council for the Millennium Experience. [21014]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company are developing arrangements for the establishment of a junior council, including identification of membership and terms of reference. I will make a detailed statement in the New Year.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio what studies he has commissioned into the likely displacement impact of the Millennium Experience on other tourist attractions in London during the millennium year. [21016]

Mr. Mandelson: The Culture, Media and Sport Select Committee have recommended that the Government commission a study of the potential displacement effects of the Millennium Experience on other tourist attractions. I shall be discussing how we should respond to this recommendation with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and will report back to the Committee within their deadline for responses. As I explained in a previous answer to the right hon. Gentleman on 16 December 1997, Official Report, column 79, the British Tourist Authority predict substantial benefits to the tourism industry in this country from the Millennium Experience.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio what targets in respect of (a) numbers of visitors and (b) revenue he has set for the Millennium Exhibition. [21118]

Mr. Mandelson: (a) I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) on 21 July 1997, Official Report, column 392, which said that the New Millennium Experience Company's Business Plan estimates that the number of visitors to the Millennium Experience will be 12 million.

(b) I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on 12 November 1997, Official Report, column 573, which said that the costs of the Millennium Experience will be covered by a grant of £399 million (net) from the Millennium Commission and forecast income of £359 million from sponsorship, commercial activities, visitor revenue and disposal income.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio what plans he has for the Millennium Dome to be dismantled after 2000 and taken around the country. [21116]

Mr. Mandelson: I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) on 1 December 1997, Official Report, columns 2–3.

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: To ask the Minister without Portfolio, pursuant to his answer of 11 November 1997, Official Report, column 533, what assessment he has made of the nature of the possible potential damage caused to (a) Richard Rogers Partnership, (b) M. and C. Saatchi and (c) Kock Hightec by the disclosure of commercial in confidence information; and what competitions for similar contracts to those conducted by (a) to (c) are currently being assessed by his Department. [17293]

Mr. Mandelson: The nature of the possible damage is covered by Exemptions 7 and 13 of the Code of Practice on Open Government, which exempt the release of information which would harm the proper and efficient conduct of the operations of a public body and would damage the competitive position of a third party. Requiring the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) to release the details of fees agreed with their current contractors might be harmful to the competitive position of these third parties in relation to any deals they may wish to strike with other companies in the future. NMEC would not be able to conduct their business efficiently or secure good value for money on the contracts they negotiate if the NMEC, required to reveal the details of their deals, were in the process making the information available to their contractors' competitors. NMEC are currently progressing a number of works and services contracts. The Department of Culture, Media and Sport, which provides advice to me in my role as shareholder of the NMEC, has an ongoing responsibility for ensuring that the Company complies with the requirement of its financial memorandum, which sets out the rules governing the letting of contracts by NDPBs.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio (1) if he will release interim accounts and contractual information for the New Millennium Experience Company before September 1998, under the Public Interest Override provisions in Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information: Guidance on Interpretation; [17591]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 11 November 1997, Official Report, column 533, what paragraphs of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information: Guidance on Interpretation form the basis of his decision not to release interim accounts and details of contracts awarded by the New Millennium Experience Company. [17613]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) are accountable to Parliament in the same way as any other Non Departmental Public Body (NDPB). As such they are required to produce audited accounts for the period between February 1997 and March 1998 by September 1998, and these will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses of Parliament at that time. Expenditure for the period before the Company became an NDPB is accounted for in the Millennium Commission's Annual Report which was placed in the libraries of both Houses in October 1997.

Only companies listed on the stock exchange are required to produce interim accounts.

To require NMEC to produce audited interim accounts would take time and place a more onerous regime on them than on other NDPBs.

The Code of Practice on Access to Government Information only relates to requests to disclose information that currently exists. As the Company does not produce Interim Accounts, the Code of Practice is not relevant in relation to this request.

As far as the request for the disclosure of contractual information is concerned, I refer the right hon. Member to the answer I have given today to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews). I do not consider that the Public Interest Override provision on Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information: Guidance on Interpretation is relevant or appropriate in this case.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Maude: To ask the Minister without Portfolio when he plans to answer the written questions tabled by the right hon. Member for Horsham on 20 November 1997, which remain unanswered. [21111]

Mr. Mandelson: I have answered the questions referred to by the right hon. Member today.

WALES

Alyn and Deeside (Assistance)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has evaluated for the restoration of full development area status for Alyn and Deeside; and if he will make a statement. [22099]

Mr. Ron Davies: The Government cannot change the Assisted Areas status of one area without considering the claims of other areas. The European Commission has the power to impose a limit on Assisted Area coverage so that, if we upgraded one area, we would be required to downgrade another area. Any future review of Assisted Areas will involve a consultation process.

Further and Higher Education Expenditure

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what will be the total level of his Department's budget in 1995–96 prices, for (a) further and (b) higher education in (i) 1997–98 and (ii) 1998–99; if he will estimate what such figures would be for (1) 1997–98 and (2) 1998–99 on the basis of the estimates of the GDP deflator contained in the November 1996 Budget; and if he will make a statement. [21955]

Mr. Ron Davies: The Department's grant for the Further and Higher Education Funding Councils for Wales is as follows:

£ million

	Provisional 1997–98	Planned 1998–99
FEFCW
Cash	177.0	175.0
1995–96 prices	169.3	162.9
1996–97 prices	173.5	167.0
HEFCW
Cash	236.8	232.3
1995–96 prices	226.5	216.2
1996–97 prices	232.1	221.6

Students (Tuition Fees)

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what factors underlie his decision that medical and dental students should pay £4,000 tuition fees. [20095]

Dr. Howells: I have been asked to reply.

Like other full-time undergraduate students, medical and dental students will pay £1,000 a year towards tuition fees only if they come from higher-income families. Dependent students from lower-income families will pay no fees at all, while those from middle-income families will contribute less than £1,000 a year.

It would be unfair to exempt all medical and dental students, including those who came from better-off families, from contributing towards their tuition fees during the first four years of their study when other students on four-year first degree courses would be required to contribute. Medical and dental students will, however, have fees for their fifth and subsequent years of study paid for them in recognition of the State's particular interest in securing a continued supply of qualified health-care professionals.

PRIME MINISTER

Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Prime Minister if he will announce the composition of the United Kingdom delegation for the 1998 ordinary session of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe. [22245]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Attorney-General how many of the Crown Prosecution Service staff in England and Wales are legally qualified; and if he will make a statement. [21490]

The Attorney-General: As at 30 November 1997, the Crown Prosecution Service employed 2,093 qualified lawyers. Of those 1,513 (72 per cent.) are employed as solicitors and 580 (28 per cent.) are employed as barristers.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Ministerial Announcements

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many ministerial announcements have not been made in the first instance to the House; and of those how many were (a) speeches to outside bodies, (b) press releases, (c) press briefings and (d) made by other means, since 1 May; and if he will make a statement about his Department's policy in respect of making public ministerial announcements. [18889]

Mr. Robin Cook [holding answer 3 December 1997]: Since 1 May, this Department has made some 90 announcements by press release, including ones relating to public speeches. All major announcements are made to Parliament when it is sitting, either by oral statement or written answer first. These include the review of arms export licensing criteria, the restoration of trade union rights to GCHQ staff, and the ending of financial support for trade missions to Burma. Press briefings are usually held to give further explanation to announcements, after they have been made.

European Court Judgments

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is being taken by Her Majesty's Government to advocate to governments of the member states of the European Community proposals to limit judgments of the European Court in respect of the (a) liability of national governments to provide retrospective compensation and (b) national time limits concerning initiation of cases. [21692]

Mr. Doug Henderson: None.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his oral answer of 25 November 1997, Official Report, column 767, what progress he has made in arranging dialogue with the Arab League and the Organisation of African Unity in relation to the Scottish justice system and Lockerbie. [20980]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have explained our position in discussions with the Secretaries-General of the Arab League and of the Organisation of African Unity. They know that we stand ready to address any specific concerns they may have about the fairness of a trial in Scotland of the Lockerbie accused. No doubt they will study carefully the report of the United Nations legal experts who visited Scotland in early December.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the report of the UN Delegation to Edinburgh in relation to assessing the Scottish legal system in relation to Lockerbie. [20996]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: A copy of this United Nations report has been placed in the Library today.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

National Lottery

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the types of contravention of the conditions of the operator's licence which would lead to the imposition of a financial penalty under section 2 of the National Lottery Bill [Lords]. [21119]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Government agree with the view expressed by the Committee of Public Accounts that the Director General of the National Lottery should have the full range of powers to deal with any contraventions of the licence conditions by holders of licences issued under the National Lottery etc. Act 1993. Under clause 2 of the National Lottery Bill [Lords], it will be for the Director General to decide whether any particular breach warrants a financial penalty. In making his decision, the Director General may have regard to the desirability of deterring future contraventions and of recovering any diminution in the amount paid to the good causes that is attributable to the breach.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what directions he plans to give to the Lottery Advisory Panel under Clause 1 of the National Lottery Bill [Lords]. [21121]

Mr. Chris Smith: The functions of the Lottery Advisory Panel on selection will be to advise and assist the Director General of the National Lottery in the selection of the operator for the National Lottery. I will issue the Panel with directions relating to its performance of that function and to its proceedings. The National Lottery Bill [Lords] requires me to consult with the Director General on any directions I might issue, and I will also provide the House with copies of these.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if (a) the National Endowment for Science Technology and the Arts and (b) the New Opportunities Fund will be under direct control. [21112]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Bill currently before Parliament which would establish the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts ("NESTA") and the New Opportunities Fund received its First Reading in another place on Wednesday 3 December.

Under the Bill, NESTA will be an executive Non-Departmental Public Body sponsored by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. The Bill establishes NESTA's objects, but its Trustees will be free to determine their own policies to meet those objects. NESTA will be required to publish a forward plan from time to time and to prepare an Annual Report and Accounts. Its Accounts will be audited by the National Audit Office and laid before Parliament, together with the Annual Report.

The New Opportunities Fund will also be an executive Non-Departmental Public Body sponsored by the Department for Culture, Media and Sport. The Fund will operate within the framework set by the legislation establishing it and the directions issued to it by the Secretary of State. The Fund will be free to set its own policies and procedures in order to take forward the initiatives it is to fund, which will be determined by the Government and Parliament following widespread consultation, and will take its own decisions on grants. The Fund will be required to publish a strategy and prepare an Annual Report and Accounts. The Accounts will be audited by the National Audit Office and laid before Parliament, together with the Annual Report.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the membership of the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts. [21024]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Bill currently before Parliament which would establish the National Endowment for Science, Technology and the Arts ("NESTA") received its First Reading in another place on Wednesday 3 December.

NESTA will consist of no more than 15 Trustees, including a Chairman. They will be appointed by the Secretary of State after wide consultation with professional bodies and organisations working in the fields of science, technology and the arts.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the membership of the New Opportunities Fund. [21023]

Mr. Chris Smith: The Bill establishing the New Opportunities Fund received its First Reading in another place on Wednesday 3 December.

The Bill currently before Parliament provides that the Fund will consist of between eight and 12 members plus a chairman. They will be appointed by the Secretary of State for their expertise in a wide variety of fields—in particular health, education and the environment—and their experience in areas such as grant making, the voluntary sector and business. Four of the Fund's members will be persons who appear to the Secretary of State to be suited to make the interests of England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland respectively their special care.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the criteria by which the strategic plans which distributing bodies will be required to produce will be judged. [21115]

Mr. Chris Smith: The National Lottery Bill [Lords] providing for the production of strategic plans by Lottery distributors received its First Reading in another place on 3 December. Plans will be drawn up by distributors following wide consultation. The content and format are matters for the distributors themselves to decide, subject to requirements set out in Clause 11 of the Bill.

(2) how many Millennium Commission bids, which have been granted funding, have been submitted by (a) women's organisations, (b) Afro-Caribbean groups and (c) Asian groups (i) at Round 1, (ii) at Round 2 and (iii) at Round 3; and how many were rejected at each round; [21346]

(3) if he will provide a breakdown of Millennium Commission bids which have reached the detailed appraisal review stage according to regional location indicating how many bids were submitted by (a) women's organisations, (b) Afro-Caribbean groups and (c) Asian groups. [21347]

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many ministerial announcements have not been made in the first instance to the House; and of those how many were (a) speeches to outside bodies, (b) press releases, (c) press briefings and (d) made by other means, since 1 May; and if he will make a statement about his Department's policy in respect of making public ministerial announcements. [18898]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 3 December 1997]: Any policy announcement that should be made to the House has been made to the House, and it is my policy to ensure that this practice continues.

Royal Parks

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the Government's policy in respect of the upkeep and maintenance of London's royal parks. [20933]

Mr. Tom Clarke: The upkeep and maintenance of the royal parks is the responsibility of the Royal Parks Agency under its Chief Executive, David Welch, which was established as an Executive Agency of my Department on 1 April 1993.

The Agency's main aims are set out in its Framework Document, copies of which have been placed in the Library. They are to manage and police the Royal Parks so that they offer peaceful enjoyment, recreation and entertainment to those who use them; they are enhanced, protected and preserved for the benefit of this and future generations; and they are managed with efficiency and effectiveness and in accordance with the principles of public service as set out in the Citizens Charter.

The objectives of the Agency include sustaining high standards of horticulture and design; attracting an increased range of visitors through publications, publicity, talks and local events; ensuring visitor safety; protecting the parks from every kind of encroachment contrary to their purpose; procuring, organising and monitoring all services in ways which ensure value for money; conserving buildings in the Parks that are of special architectural or historic interest, and meeting financial and other performance targets.

The detailed management strategy is set out in the Agency's Corporate Plan, which is approved by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State each year.

Museums and Galleries

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make a statement on the charging policy at each of the national museums and galleries. [19516]

Mr. Fisher: It is for the Trustees of each museum to decide what measures should be adopted to promote access to their museum within available resources. For some that will be free admission; others will choose to promote access in other ways. We wish institutions to do all they can to balance the books while maximising access.

A review of access to the national museums and galleries began in May. This has examined the effect of charges and identified other barriers to access. Our policy was outlined in an interim statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 8 December. A consultation paper was also published inviting views on a code of good practice on access.

Further consideration will be given to all aspects of access policy for museums and galleries in the context of the Departmental Spending Review. The review is taking a fundamental look at spending priorities across the whole range of the Department's responsibilities and will be completed next summer.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what methods are used to calculate visitor numbers at free admission museums; and if his Department requires these figures to be independently audited before awarding grant-in-aid. [19510]

Mr. Fisher: Methods of counting visitors vary from institution to institution. Manual counting by security staff or warders at the entrance is used by the British Museum, the National Portrait Gallery, the Tate Gallery, the National Gallery, the Wallace Collection and the Geffrye Museum. At Sir John Soane's Museum all visitors must sign the visitors book before admission. Electronic methods of counting are being trialled at some free museums.

The manual counting methods in use are prone to error and are likely to over-estimate the true number of visitors.

It is not a requirement of grant-in-aid that the counts should be independently audited.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the level of grant-in-aid which will be supplied in the next financial year to each national museum and gallery funded directly by his Department using 1996–97 as the base year. [19511]

Mr. Fisher: The information is given in the following table.

Institution	Grant-in-aid allocation 1996–97 £	Grant-in-aid allocation 1998–99 £
British Museum	33,196,000	32,921,000
Imperial War Museum	10,678,000	10,573,000
National Gallery	18,726,000	17,889,000

Broadcasting Standards Commission

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for culture, Media and Sport (1) what was the average time taken by the Broadcasting Standards Commission to investigate and respond to complaints over the first six months of (a) 1996 and (b) 1997; [20825]

(2) how many complaints the Broadcasting Standards Commission investigated in the first six months of (a) 1996 and (b) 1997; [20823]

(3) if he will list all of the programmes which have been the subject of complaints subsequently upheld by the Broadcasting Standards Commission since 1 January 1996; [20826]

(4) if he will list all the programmes about which two or more complaints have been made to the Broadcasting Standards Commission in the first six months of 1997. [20824]

Mr. Fisher [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The Broadcasting Standards Commission became operational on 1 April, 1997 following a merger, provided for under the Broadcasting Act 1996, of the Broadcasting Complaints Commission and Broadcasting Standards Council. Prior to 1 April 1997 the Broadcasting Complaints Commission had responsibility for complaints about unfair representation and breach of privacy from those portrayed in broadcasts (which usually require a formal hearing attended by Commissioners, complainant and broadcaster), whilst the Broadcasting Standards Council had responsibility for complaints from viewers and listeners about the "taste and decency" standards of programme content. The new commission has responsibility for both these categories of complaints.

Between 1 January and 30 June 1996, 53 fairness complaints and 1,702 standards complaints were investigated, and between 1 January and 30 June 1997, 81 fairness complaints and 1,533 standards complaints were investigated. The average time taken to consider fairness complaints was 259 days in the first six months of 1996 and 184 days in the first six months of 1997. The average time taken to consider standards complaints was 74 working days in the first six months of 1996 and 68 working days in the first six months of 1997. I have today placed this information in the Libraries of the House together with the lists requested by the hon. Member of programmes against which multiple complaints were made and programmes against which complaints were upheld.

Funding Distribution

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much funding has been distributed by (a) the Millennium Commission, (b) the National Lottery Charities Board, (c) the National Heritage Memorial Fund, (d) the Arts Council and (e) the Sports Council to projects in, or associated with, (i) Wirral, South constituency and (ii) the Wirral; and what is the average funding distributed per constituency (1) in the Wirral, (2) in Merseyside and (3) nationally by each of those bodies. [21326]

Mr. Banks: The information is set out in the following table.

Information on Lottery awards can now be found on the Department's website www.lottery.culture.gov.uk. It is updated on a regular basis.

[1] "The Wirral" comprises the constituencies of Wallasey, Birkenhead, Wirral South and Wirral West.
[2] There are 16 constituencies in Merseyside.
There are 529 constituencies in England.

Arts Funding

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what monitoring his Department undertakes to ensure that arts funding provides value for money; [21238]

(2) if he will make a statement on the factors used in determining the level of spending on the arts; [21237]

(3) what mechanisms are used to decide between national and local priorities in arts funding; [21678]

(4) what mechanisms he uses to allocate funding to those arts which his Department supports. [21677]

Mr. Fisher: In considering the allocation of resources between the portfolios for which my Department is responsible we have regard to a range of factors. In respect of the arts we are assisted by advice from the Arts Council, whose responsibility it is, with the ten Regional Arts Boards, to take detailed decisions on the allocation of grant-in-aid between artforms, and to arts organisations and activities. A range of arrangements cover the Department's monitoring of spending by the Arts Council; the Financial Memorandum, the annual Funding Agreement, the corporate and business plans. The council reports each year on spending in its annual report.

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has for a fundamental review of Government spending on the arts; and if he will make a statement. [21613]

Mr. Fisher: The terms of reference for my Department's fundamental review of expenditure were published on 24 July. Copies are available in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Snape: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what consultations he held with the Arts Council before its announcement that capital Lottery projects, with the exception of four projects of national significance, were to be capped; if the C-Plex project in West Bromwich qualifies as such a project; and what criteria the Arts Council has used to define national significance. [22139]

Mr. Fisher: Decisions on the allocation of lottery funds to the arts in England are made by the independent distributing body, the Arts Council of England. The Arts Council did not consult me before its recent announcement on future capital awards.

Television Licences

Mr. Flight: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will review the arrangements for giving pensioners discounted licence fees during his comprehensive review of the BBC licence fee system prior to 2002. [21614]

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Tourism

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much Britain has received in European Union grants for tourism-related projects in each of the last three years. [22021]

Mr. Fisher: Many community programmes have an impact on tourism, or tourism has a role to play in them even though it is not their primary purpose. No figures are therefore available which show the total spending which might have relevance to tourism. The Department for Culture, Media and Sport submitted an Explanatory Memorandum to Parliament on 31 July on European Community Document (COM(97)) 332 Final (also numbered 9712/97): Community Measures Affecting Tourism in 1995–96. The Document highlights some of the main areas of Community activity from which tourism benefits.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much national lottery money has been allocated to tourism-related projects in each of the last three years. [22088]

Mr. Fisher: The national lottery was established to help support five good causes: sports, arts, heritage, charities and to celebrate the millennium. So far £4.6 billion has been awarded to over 38,000 projects nationwide. While no national lottery funding has therefore been specifically allocated to tourism, many of the funded projects attract tourists to their areas.

Cricket

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much public money is planned to be spent on preparations for the 1999 Cricket World Cup. [22258]

Mr. Fisher: No public money is planned to be spent on the 1999 Cricket World Cup in England.

DEFENCE

Eurofighter

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the Eurofighter programme. [22341]

Mr. George Robertson: I am delighted to announce that today in Bonn, along with my Germany, Italian and Spanish opposite numbers, I signed the Memoranda of Understanding enabling us to proceed to the production and in-service support phases of the Eurofighter programme.

The Government have remained resolutely committed to the Eurofighter programme and today's development represents a significant step forward. We need Eurofighter to replace our Tornado F3 and Jaguar. The first aircraft is scheduled to be delivered to the RAF in June 2002. Eurofighter is an aircraft for the future and will provide the key component of the RAF's fighting capability.

This development will be enthusiastically greeted by industry. Tens of thousands of highly skilled jobs will be sustained in the UK and in Germany, Italy and Spain during the production phase. The four nations have declared a requirement for a total of 620 aircraft, 232 of which will be for the RAF. Eurofighter is the largest defence collaborative equipment programme in Europe and is an important contribution to European defence co-operation.

Royal Military College of Science, Shrivenham

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for each of the past five years the number of students who left the Royal Military College of Science at Shrivenham before the completion of their degree courses, stating after which year of their course they left and for what reason. [21710]

Dr. Reid: The number of UK and FCO-sponsored military students who left the Royal Military College of Science at Shrivenham over the last five years without completing their degree course is detailed as follows:

Year	Total degree students	Fall out	Percentage failure
1993	362	1 × Year 1: personal reasons 1 × Year 3: disciplinary reasons 4 × Year 1: failed 7 × Year 2: failed	3.6
1994	452	6 × Year 1: personal reasons 2 × Year 2: personal reasons 1 × Year 3: personal reasons 6 × Year 1: failed 4 × Year 2: failed	4.2
1995	455	2 × Year 1: personal reasons 2 × Year 2: personal reasons 1 × Year 3: personal reasons 2 × Year 1: failed 3 × Year 2: failed 1 × Year 3: failed	2.4
1996	439	1 × Year 1: personal reasons 1 × Year 2: serious injury 1 × Year 3: personal reasons 11 × Year 1: failed 11 × Year 2: failed	5.7

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department has current dealings with (a) non-governmental organisations and (b) suppliers which are not millennium compliant; and on what date his Department will cease to deal with (i) non-governmental organisations and (ii) suppliers which are not millennium compliant. [20531]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 12 December 1997]: The Ministry of Defence is maintaining a dialogue with non-governmental organisations and suppliers to alert them to the risk posed by the millennium date change problem.

For all new MOD equipment procurement contracts, all suppliers are contractually bound to ensure that their goods are millennium-compliant. Where a company or organisation is contracted to supply a service beyond the end of the century, we are reminding them of the need to meet their contractual commitments.

MOD has in excess of 10,000 individual suppliers covering a wide range of goods and services, some operationally critical, some not. Whether to not the MOD continues to deal with organisations and suppliers will depend on the nature of the requirement and the supplier's ability to continue to meet agreed delivery dates. When assessing a tender which requires the supply of goods and services through and beyond the end of the century, MOD takes full account of the risks involved and will place contracts with only those suppliers who can provide the necessary assurances that the commitment can be met.

Troop Deployment (Germany)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British troops are at present stationed in Germany; and what is the estimated cost of this deployment for 1997. [21890]

Dr. Reid: I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library.

Defence Spending

Mr. Ruane: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list in descending order the amount spent on the total defence budget per head in each United Kingdom region in 1995–96. [22032]

Dr. Reid: Total defence expenditure cannot be broken down by region. However, "Defence Statistics 1997", a copy of which is in the Library, contains information on the deployment of service personnel and Ministry of Defence civilian staff in the regions. It also provides a breakdown of equipment expenditure by region and estimates of employment dependent on such expenditure. In 1995–96, per capita spending on defence by the United Kingdom was estimated at £367.

Gulf War Veterans

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to meet Gulf War veterans. [22145]

Dr. Reid: I have held, and will continue to hold, regular meetings with Gulf War veterans' representatives to listen to their views and suggestions and to explain how the Government are taking forward the various steps which I have already announced to address veterans' concerns. The most recent meeting was held on 10 December.

Compensation Review

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the review into compensating service personnel for death or injury due to service will be completed. [22244]

Dr. Reid: The aim will be to complete the review of the arrangements for compensating Service personnel who suffer death, injury or illness as a result of their military service, which was announced on 8 December, in time for the publication of a consultative document next Summer.

Falklands Garrison

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give the total costs broken down by category of maintaining the Falklands garrison in the last year for which figures are available. [21648]

Dr. Reid: The outturn cost to the Ministry of Defence of the Falkland Islands Garrison for financial year 1996–97 was £81 million. This figure comprises £42 million for personnel costs, £22 million for works and property maintenance, £14 million for logistics, movements, administration and headquarters, and £3 million for utilities.

Territorial Army

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Territorial Army infantry battalions and companies there were in each of the last 10 years; how many of each are planned for next year; and if he will make a statement. [21652]

Dr. Reid: The number of Territorial Army Infantry Battalions and Companies in each of the last 10 years is as follows:

TA Infantry Battalions and Companies

	Battalions	Companies
1988	41	164
1989	41	164
1990	41	164
1991	41	164
1992	36	109
1993	36	109
1994	36	109
1995	36	109
1996	33	95
1997	33	95

These figures do not include the SAS (Volunteer) Regiment, the Gibraltar Regiment and the Royal Irish (Home Service) Regiment.

The future size and shape of the Territorial Army, including the number of Infantry battalions and companies, will be determined by the Strategic Defence Review as part of our work on the Armed Forces as a whole.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was (a) the ceiling on personnel numbers and (b) the actual strength of the Territorial Army in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [21651]

Dr. Reid: The strength and establishment of the Territorial Army as at the first of April in each of the last 10 years is as follows:

	Strength	Establishment
1988	74,700	86,000
1989	72,500	86,000
1990	72,500	86,000
1991	73,300	86,000
1992	71,300	63,500
1993	68,500	63,500
1994	65,000	63,500
1995	59,700	59,000
1996	56,100	59,000
1997	55,900	59,000

The future size and shape of the Territorial Army will be determined by the Strategic Defence Review as part of our work on the Armed Forces as a whole. I am confident that the Review will produce a coherent and imaginative blueprint for the Reserves into the next century.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Territorial Army centres there were in each of the last 10 years. [21653]

Dr. Reid: The number of Territorial Army Centres in each of the last ten years are as follows:

Year	Number of TA centres
1988	535
1989	539
1990	542
1991	541
1992	535
1993	525
1994	519
1995	505
1996	479
1997	466

TA Centres are defined here as buildings which accommodate TA units, sub-units or detachments. Former TA Centres which are either vacant and awaiting disposal, which only house Cadet detachments, and TAVRA Headquarters buildings are excluded.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what amounts, broken down by category, were spent by his Department on private finance initiatives in Northern Ireland prior to his decision to approve the exploration of PFI pilot schemes; and on whose authority such expenditure was incurred. [21435]

Dr. Reid: I agreed on 3 June 1997 that consultation with the Trades Unions and briefing of interested firms should take place on two PFI pilot schemes in Northern Ireland. Prior to this date the Head of the MOD Private Finance Unit had authorised the placing of a contract with Coopers and Lybrand to advise on PFI in Northern Ireland. I am withholding details of individual contract values under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. In addition the General Officer Commanding Northern Ireland authorised the setting up of the nucleus of a PFI team within his Headquarters to undertake the necessary preparatory work. Expenditure of approximately £20,700 on salaries and related costs and approximately £1,350 on travel and subsistence costs was incurred prior to 3 June 1997 by members of the team. Other individuals within Headquarters Northern Ireland and the Private Finance Unit were involved in work on PFI in Northern Ireland as part of their normal responsibilities. Their costs cannot be separately identified.

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the terms of reference for the PFI pilot schemes recently authorised in Northern Ireland. [21437]

Dr. Reid: The scope of the first Northern Ireland PFI pilot scheme covers first, construction and facilities management services for 370 new families quarters within the towns of Lisburn, Antrim and Ballymena and the facilities management services for an existing 21 families' quarters in Ballymena; and, secondly, provision of facilities management services for 566 families' quarters in Lisburn. This may involve transfer of the families' quarters to the service provider on a permanent or semi-permanent basis. In all cases the service period would be for approximately 25 years. The scope of the second pilot scheme is still being refined but is likely to cover a full range of services for Thiepval Barracks for a period of approximately 25 years. The general requirement, in addition to capital works, is expected to include estate management, serviced accommodation, stores management, motor transport support and maintenance, energy management, office support services, community and support services and leisure facilities management.

Building Management Staff

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary for Defence if he will list the employment options made available to Building Management staff on privatisation. [21434]

Dr. Reid: The estate management organisation in Northern Ireland, which includes Building Management, is being reviewed. There are, however, no current plans for privatisation.

Staff Pay

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies his Department has undertaken on the relative costs of employing (a) civilian and (b) military personnel in Northern Ireland, and on average salary differentials; and if he will make a statement on the factors which underlie decisions on this matter. [21436]

Dr. Reid: There have been no specific studies recently on this topic in Northern Ireland. The military and civilian manpower mix in MOD establishments in Northern Ireland is kept under review to provide the most cost-effective use of personnel. Depending on the nature of the work in question a range of factors will be taken into account, not just cost.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many servicemen and women are currently in receipt of income support; and if he will make a statement. [21649]

Mr. Spellar: The information requested is not held by MOD. Should any Service Personnel be eligible for Income Support, which is unlikely in view of the qualifying criteria, a claim would be made directly to the Department of Social Security.

Border Checkpoint, Newry

Mr. Robert McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the security implications of removing the border checkpoint on the road outside Newry; what were the costs of its removal; and what estimate he has made of the cost of re-erecting it. [21438]

Dr. Reid: There are no security implications associated with the removal of the vehicle checkpoint from the road outside Newry which has not been in use since November 1994. There are currently no plans to close the adjacent patrol base.

The removal costs are estimated to be around £20,000, not including the costs of reinstating the road, which will fall to the Northern Ireland Office.

My Department has made no estimate of the cost of re-erecting the vehicle checkpoint.

Trafalgar Bicentenary

Mr. Rapson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to commemorate the bicentenary of the Battle of Trafalgar and the death of Admiral Lord Nelson. [22156]

Mr. Spellar: We have begun to consider how we can commemorate the bicentenary in October 2005. We expect there to be major coverage and are already planning for the current restoration work on HMS Victory to be completed in time for this event, and for Navy days to be held in Portsmouth that year. We would welcome other imaginative proposals to commemorate this significant anniversary.

Trident

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the arming-fusing-firing mechanism for the UK's Trident warhead is wholly owned by the UK. [21823]

Dr. Reid: Yes.

Naval Establishments

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the annual running costs of (a) the Royal Naval Armaments Depot, Coulport and (b) the Clyde Submarine Base, Faslane. [21207]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 17 December 1997]: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Naval Bases and Supply Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from D. J. Stevens to Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, dated 22 December 1997:

I am replying to your Question to the Secretary of State for Defence about the running costs of the Royal Naval Armament Depot (RNAD) Coulport and the Clyde Naval Base Faslane as this matter falls within the area of responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Naval Bases and Supply Agency.

The annual running cost for the financial year 1997/98 for RNAD Coulport is £50.747M and that for the Naval Base, Faslane is £130.659M. These figures are expressed at 97/98 price levels.

Correspondence

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Minister for the Armed Forces will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Salisbury, dated 17 November, to him about the case of Lt. Colonel Keith Pople. [21711]

Dr. Reid: I have today written to the hon. Gentleman.

Christmas Island (DDT Spray)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the quantities of DDT used by British forces remaining on Christmas Island. [20801]

Mr. Spellar: We are aware that diluted DDT was sprayed from the air by British forces on Christmas Island, though the records are very limited. The only recorded quantities are for January, February and April 1959 when nearly 209,000 gallons of diluted spray were used. Typical dilutions were one part DDT per 1,000 parts water.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the impact on health of the use of DDT spray on British service personnel on Christmas Island; [20877]

(2) what arrangements exist to monitor and update the medical records of service personnel who served on Christmas Island. [20802]

Mr. Spellar: Christmas Island provides a rich environment for a variety of insects. In the late 1950s and early 1960s when British troops were stationed there, DDT spraying was used for insect control, as was common practice elsewhere in the world at the time. So far as can be established from available records, my Department has made no particular assessments concerning the use of DDT on Christmas Island. Independent studies covering British Nuclear Test Veterans including Service Personnel who served on Christmas Island by the National Radiological Protection Board have shown, however, that "participation in the test programme has not had a detectable effect on participants' expectation of life nor on their risk of developing cancer".

We are maintaining a database on the incidence of cancer and cause of death in the test veteran group.

Clapham Deep Shelter

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Clapham Deep Shelter still exists. [21398]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I have been asked to reply.

Responsibility for this matter has been delegated under the terms of the Framework Document to the Property Advisers to the Civil Estate. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has asked its Chief Executive, Mr. John Locke, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John C. Locke to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 19 December 1997:

Your question on the above to The Secretary of State for Defence has been passed to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who has asked me to reply.

Seven Deep Tube Shelters are now managed by Property Advisers to the Civil Estate, PACE.

There are three tube shelters at Clapham, they are at Clapham North, Clapham South and Clapham Common. The last two are let for storage, the first is vacant.

PACE are at the moment in the process of disposing of all seven Deep Tube Shelters. We have conducted an informal tender and hope shortly to conclude a sale.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Night Flights (Heathrow)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a sttaement on the Government's policy in respect of night flights into Heathrow; and what representations he has received on such flights. [20939]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The policy of successive Governments in setting night restrictions has been to strike a balance between the interests of local people and those of the aviation industry, users and the wider economy. When the current regime of night flying restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted was introduced it was envisaged that it would run until October 1998. The Department has received representations from both sides of the debate in recent months. I intend to publish a consultation paper on the subject early in the New Year.

Radon

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of houses in the Craven District of North Yorkshire which have been made radon proof since the publication of the latest guidance on the subject by his Department. [21106]

Angela Eagle: Within the area covered by Craven District Council, 330 householders have applied to have a measurement under the Government's radon measurement programme and of those 29 have been found to be above the recommended "Action Level".

There is no obligation on householders to inform the Government when they have carried out radon remedial works. My Department does not, therefore, hold statistics concerning the number of owners of existing dwellings who have taken radon remedial action in any given area. However, research indicates that between 11 and 18 per cent. of householders in England as a whole, who have homes above the radon Action Level have so far taken some remedial action.

Building Regulations are used to address potential radon problems in new dwellings. New guidance has been drafted to take into account areas newly identified in May 1996 as being affected by elevated radon levels. The draft guidance sets out both the areas where protective measures to prevent radon entering should apply and what those measures should be. It was subject to a public consultation, which ended in May 1997. The guidance will be issued shortly. Although there are currently no formal requirements to apply radon protective measures to new dwellings Craven, we are aware that they are being adopted on a voluntary basis.

Telecommunications Masts

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what guidance his Department has issued on the minium safe distance from telecommunications masts for (a) houses and (b) buildings housing animals in respect of microwave radiation. [21251]

Mr. Raynsford: Guidance on limiting exposure to electromagnetic radiation is issued by the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) which has a statutory function to provide advice to Government on all radiation matters. The guidance specifies restrictions on the exposure of people rather than safe distances from equipment. The NRPB advises that radio waves at ground level and in regions accessible to the public and to animals tends to be many times below guideline levels and should present no significant health risk. Telecommunications operators have a duty under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 and the Management of the Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1992 to ensure that their work activities, which would include the operation of their apparatus, do not present a risk to employees and the general public.

Railway Lines (Safety)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the number of railway officers visiting schools to educate children on the importance of safety near railway lines has been reduced in the last two years. [21819]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Over the last two years there have been a number of safety campaigns launched by Railtrack, the British Transport Police and the railway companies to educate children and parents on the danger of trespassing on the railway. These include visits to schools by police officers and railway companies, particularly in areas where there is a high incidence of child trespass. Details of the number of officers who visit schools are not collected centrally.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) children and (b) adults have been killed on railway lines in each year since 1992. [21818]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This information is contained in the Chief Inspector of Railways' Annual Report on Railway Safety in Great Britain, copies of which are placed in the Library each year. The figures for the number of (a) children and (b) adults killed on the railway are reproduced in the following tables.

Fatalities on the railway

	1992–93	1993–94	1994–95	1995–96	1996–97
(A) Children under the age of 16
Passengers	0	0	0	1	0
Other members of the public	1	1	1	0	0
Trespassers	5	7	6	7	10
Suicides	0	1	0	0	0
Total	6	9	7	8	10
(B) Adults
Passengers	18	17	17	10	17
Staff including contractors	11	8	9	5	2
Other members of the public	9	15	15	12	6
Trespassers	127	114	113	100	126
Suicides	132	140	135	126	116
Total	297	294	289	266	267

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions staff employed by Virgin Trains have visited schools to educate children about rail safety in the North West. [22061]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This is a matter for Virgin Trains.

Housing

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what work his Department is currently carrying out to develop policies to increase the re-use of current housing and other building stock. [21778]

Mr. Raynsford: The Government are considering policies in this area in the light of responses to the previous Administration's consultation on household growth issues.

Three specific studies due to report during 1998 will also inform policy development on the re-use and redevelopment of the building stock for housing. These are on conversion, demolition and redevelopment processes and potential; the scope for using floors over shops and vacant shops in London to provide additional housing; and housing and mixed use development in town centres.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken since 1 May, to (a) require and (b) assist local authorities to carry out and update studies which assess capacity for increasing the amount of housing on previously used land in their areas; what funds his Department provides for studies on this subject; and if he will make a statement. [21771]

Mr. Raynsford: There is no specific requirement on local authorities to undertake such studies. Results from the following research projects commissioned recently or due to be commissioned shortly will assist local authorities to assess the potential for increasing the amount of housing on previously used land. My Department's funding is shown where known.

Government Office region	Project	DETR funding
Northern	The potential of urban areas in the Northern region to accept new housing development	£15,000
Eastern	Development capacity in the Cambridge area and Suffolk	£15,000 to £20,000
East Midlands	Urban capacity in the East Midlands	£15,000
West Midlands	Environmental impact of increasing household numbers by 10, 20 and 30 per cent. above existing Regional Planning Guidance 11 figures—
North West Region	To explore urban potential for housing	£20,000
Yorkshire and Humberside	Settlement capacity and regional development options	£20,000
South East	Housing capability in the South East	£25,000
London	Sustainable residential quality in London	£40,000
	Potential large-scale land releases in London	£40,000
	Housing above shops in London	26,500
National	Supply and location of future brownfield sites

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to amend planning guidance to encourage a higher proportion of higher density new housing. [21820]

Mr. Raynsford: Current guidance on housing densities is contained in Planning Policy Guidance Notes 3 and 13. Copies of these documents are held in the House of Commons Library. The Government are currently considering all the responses to the last Administration's Green Paper "Household Growth: Where Shall We Live?", some of which raised issues of density, in helping us to decide on the way forward on household growth generally.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures he proposes to encourage people to (a) restore, (b) enlarge and (c) sub-divide existing homes; and what representations he has received on this issue. [21775]

Mr. Raynsford: We will continue to encourage local authorities to act as strategic enablers in ensuring better use of existing homes in all sectors, tackling under-occupation and bringing empty properties back into use.

Public funding is provided to local authorities and Registered Social Landlords for rehabilitation and conversion of properties. We have taken early action to increase investment in housing through our Capital Receipts Initiative. Nearly £800 million is available to local authorities in England in 1997–98 and 1998–99 under the Initiative, and we expect much of this additional money to be directed towards renovation and improvement of the existing stock.

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what increase is forecast in the number of formerly married men and women living alone as owner occupiers in the period 1991 to 2011; and what assumptions are made about their housing requirements and changes in their housing arrangements for the purposes of regional planning guidance for new housing. [21770]

Mr. Raynsford: The 1992-based household projections show that the total number of formerly married men and women living alone is projected to rise by 1.3 million in the period 1991 to 2011. Of these men and women, 1 million are estimated to be divorced or separated, and 0.3 million widowed. The household projections did not distinguish household tenure.

The household projections, which include estimates for a range of different household types, are just one of the factors that must be taken into account by the regional conferences of local authorities in their preparation of Regional Planning Guidance on housing requirements for the Secretary of State. Local planning authorities are required to ensure a reasonable mix and balance of house types and sizes to cater for a range of housing needs.

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will release the research report proposing an update to the Index of Local Conditions. [22221]

Mr. Caborn: I am today placing in the Libraries of the House copies of the research report by Professor Robson of Manchester University, together with a note by my Department inviting comments on the proposals to update the Index of Local Conditions.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions for what reasons his Department's control total for housing for 1997–98 has fallen. [21899]

Mr. Raynsford: Spending plans for housing and construction for 1996–97 and 1997–98 are net of receipts of £500 million and £652 million respectively from the sale of the Housing Corporation's loans portfolio. Within the Department's overall spending ceiling, however, no significant adjustments have been made to planned spending on housing and construction in 1997–98.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the effect the fall in his Department's control total for housing will have on public housing expenditure in 1997–98. [21898]

Mr. Raynsford: The underlying pattern of spending on housing and construction is slightly distorted because the figures for 1996–97 and 1997–98 are net of receipts from the sale of the Housing Corporation's loans portfolio (£500 million in 1996–97 and a further £652 million in 1997–98). However, it was the recognition of pressing housing need and the impact of sustained cuts in housing resources that prompted this Government's Capital Receipts Initiative. This initiative, the resources for which lie outside the Department's control total, will release an additional £800 million in England in 1997–98 and 1998–99 to support capital spending on housing and housing associated regeneration.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to reduce the number of planning appeals awaiting decision. [21866]

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning will be issuing a policy statement on this and other issues shortly.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many planning decisions were called in and awaiting decision on 1 December. [21865]

Mr. Raynsford: I will write to my hon. Friend and place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Councils (Best Value Pilots)

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the representativeness of councils chosen to pilot best value. [21641]

Mr. Raynsford: Over 150 bids to pilot best value were assessed by an Evaluation Panel comprising representatives of local and central government, the Government Offices of the Regions, Trade Unions, the private sector, and the Audit Commission, supported by a research team from the Warwick Business School. The aim of that assessment was to ensure that the pilot programme tested the provisional Best Value framework under a wide variety of different circumstances. The Evaluation Panel's recommendations were accepted in full.

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to inform those councils that did not become pilot councils of the progress of best value and of the experiences of pilot councils. [21642]

Mr. Raynsford: A research contract has been let with the Warwick Business School of the University of Warwick to evaluate the Best Value pilot programme and disseminate information flowing from it. Dissemination will include a series of good practice papers on different aspects of the process, as well as a self diagnosis framework and a web site. A series of regular events will also be arranged to bring together the pilots and other authorities so as to enable them to share experience.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if his Department's estimates of the total costs of resolving the millennium compliance problem include costs relating to the embedded chip problem; and if he will make a statement. [21567]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 18 December 1997]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 4 November 1997, Official Report, column 150 and to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Etherington) on 18 December 1997, Official Report, column 272. The cost provided included all costs known to date, including those relating to the embedded chip problem.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what millennium compliance problems have occurred to date in his (a) Department, (b) agencies and (c) other public bodies; and if he will make a statement [21566]

Angela Eagle [holding answer 18 December 1997]: The Department of Environment, Transport and the Regions has not experienced any millennium compliance problems to date. However the Department is continuing to monitor the position and put in place procedures to deal with any problems that might occur. One Executive Agency reported identifying a potential problem with an expiry date but this has been solved with a pre-emptive "fix". Information is not maintained centrally on other public bodies.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the total revenue, at 1997 prices, from (a) domestic rates in 1989–90, (b) the community charge in 1990–91, (c) the community charge in 1991–92 and (d) the council tax for the latest year for which figures are available. [21774]

Mr. Raynsford: The information requested is as follows:

	1997–98 prices
Domestic rate yield, gross of rate rebates but net of domestic rate relief grant
1989–90	13,308
Community charge yield, gross of community charge benefit but net of community charge reduction scheme and community charge grant
1990–91	14,981
1991–92	8,880
Council tax yield, gross of council tax benefit but net of council tax transitional relief grant
1997–98	11,226

Joint Enforcement Database

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) when the current phase of the Joint Enforcement Database initiative pilot scheme will be completed; [21783]

(2) when later phases of the Joint Enforcement Database initiative pilot scheme will be implemented. [21784]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Joint Enforcement Database Initiative (JEDI) comprises several stages and is still under development.

Stage one, phase one of JEDI commenced with the issue of notebook computers to Vehicle Inspectorate enforcement staff in April 1997. Planning for stage one's other phases has yet to be completed. Stage one, phase two—the first operational system—the provision of enquiry access to the test result database and the ability to input roadside inspection results, is now scheduled for implementation in August 1998. The remaining phases of this stage are likely to be implemented throughout 1999.

The timing of subsequent stages has yet to be decided.

Association of Town Centre Management

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he last met the Chairman of the Association of Town Centre Management. [21867]

Mr. Raynsford: The Secretary of State has not met the Chairman of the Association of Town Centre Management, but the Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning has, and the topic discussed was the progress of town centre management.

West Coast Main Line

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) accidents and (b) faults have been reported on the West coast main line in each year since 1992. [21671]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I regret that this information is not available in the format requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

There have been a number of changes to regional railway boundaries and routes since 1992. Also, prior to April 1996, some information on "faults" such as wrong side signalling failures and signals passed at danger was voluntarily reported. These figures related only to the overall total and no regional figures were supplied.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what regulations governing the number of people permitted to travel on any one train apply on the West Coast main line, and how they are enforced. [21673]

Ms Glenda Jackson: They are no regulations governing the number of people permitted to travel on any one train on the West Coast main line.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions by what percentage the incidence of accidents reported on the West Coast main line has changed since privatisation. [21672]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I regret that this information is not available in the form requested. The regime for the reporting of accidents changed on 1 April 1996 with the introduction of the Reporting of Injuries, Diseases and Dangerous Occurances Regulation 1995 (RIDDOR 95). In addition, accidents are recorded against relevant Railtrack Zones. The West Coast main line covers several such zones and some of the boundaries have changed since the creation of Railtrack on April 1994.

Heathrow Airport (Aborted Landings)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what has been the (a) number and (b) percentage of aborted landings at Heathrow in each of the last three years. [21893]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number and percentage of missed approaches at Heathrow airport for each of the last three years is as follows:

1995: a total of 446 or 0.20 per cent.;

1996: a total of 526 or 0.24 per cent.; and

1997: (to 30 November) a total of 487 or 0.24 per cent.

Opencast Coal Mines

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his review of opencast coal operations. [22146]

Mr. Caborn: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Bradley) on 17 December 1997, Official Report, column 196.

Council Tax

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to review the property bands for the council tax to reflect changes in house prices since 1990. [21886]

Mr. Raynsford: Valuations for council tax purposes are currently based on their open market value on 1 April 1991. As part of the review of the local government finance system announced on 25 July 1997, we are considering how we might improve the fairness of the distribution of the council tax burden. This includes the question of whether properties should be revalued and whether any changes should be made to the current structure of the valuation bands. I expect a consultation document to be issued in the New Year before a White Paper is published early next summer.

Railways (Cut Price Tickets)

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers he has to stop rail franchise holders abolishing saver, super saver and other cut-price, walk-on tickets. [22372]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Under the Railways Act 1993 the regulation of fares is a matter for the Franchising Director. Under the present franchise agreements, there is at least one regulated fare between any two points, which must be offered. For medium to long distance journeys this is the Saver ticket, which is regulated by the Franchising Director and must continue to be offered for sale at a price that does not increase above the rate of inflation. From 1999 the cap on these fares will be RPI-minus 1 per cent. However, it is in the operators' commercial interests to offer other discounted tickets to attract additional business when they have capacity available and to make use of that capacity. We are currently conducting a review of the railway industry, which includes the regulation of fares.

Bognor Regis Centre

Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will investigate the tendering process undertaken by Arun District Council for the sale of the Bognor Regis Centre to establish (a) that the highest tender was accepted and (b) that no undue influence was exerted on the council during the tendering process. [22190]

Mr. Raynsford: No. This is a matter for the Council and its external auditor.

Peat Working Group

Mr. Randall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what are the terms of reference and objectives of the Peat Working Group; what is its membership; and if he will make a statement. [22264]

Mr. Raynsford: The terms of reference and objectives of the Peat Working Group are: to advise my Department about current peat extraction and usage having regard to the overall peatland resource in Britain and the place of imports and alternatives, and to the Government's general policies for reconciling the supply of minerals with sustainable development; and to monitor, at a national level, guidance in respect of: development control over existing extraction sites; rehabilitation of existing workings; and future land-use issues affecting peatlands, especially the nature conservation of, and extraction from, lowland peat mires.

The membership of the Peat Working Group is drawn from the following organisations:

Joint Nature Conservation Committee

English Nature

Countryside Council for Wales

Scottish Natural Heritage

Countryside Commission

Planning Officers Society

Forestry Authority

ADAS

Peat Producers Association

Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food

Scottish Office

Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Chair and secretariat).

Car Exhaust Emissions

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many road-side tests on the quality of motor car exhaust systems have taken place since 1 January. [22181]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Between 1 January and the end of November 1997 the Vehicle Inspectorate conducted 74,916 exhaust emission spot checks on cars at the roadside; 1,299 spot checks were also carried out on the general mechanical condition of cars, which would have included, where possible, a check on the condition of the exhaust system.

Regional Government

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to consult on ways of improving (a) the procedures for producing and (b) the content of regional planning guidance; and if he will make a statement. [22151]

Mr. Caborn: The Department will be publishing a consultation paper early in the New Year which will set out proposals for improving both the procedures for, and the content of, Regional Planning Guidance.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which English regions have regional chambers in place; for how long each has been established; and whether their boundaries match those of the Government Offices of the Regions. [22153]

Mr. Caborn: Regional chambers of the type envisaged in the Government's White Paper "Building Partnerships for Prosperity" published on 3 December do not yet exist but almost all regions are making progress towards the creation of chambers which includes representatives of all the regional stakeholders.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how long the terms of appointment will be for members of RDA boards. [22148]

Mr. Caborn: The length of appointment will be determined separately for each board member.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will review the borders of the Government Offices of the Regions to reflect other regional organisations and groups. [22150]

Mr. Caborn: We have no plans to do so at present.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each of the English regions the number of members of RDA boards whom he plans to appoint on the grounds of their expertise in rural affairs. [22154]

Mr. Caborn: Outside London every RDA board will include at least one board member who can contribute a strong rural perspective, and more in regions with larger rural areas.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if it is his policy to publish (a) the remuneration given to members of RDA boards and (b) details of allowances which are claimed by board members. [22147]

Mr. Caborn: Details of the remuneration of RDA board members will be published in the Office of Public Service's annual publication "Public Bodies". Such remuneration and also a statement of the total expenses payable to board members—being reimbursements and other expenditure in respect of travelling, subsistence and hospitality—will be published in RDA's annual accounts which will be prepared in accordance with directions issued by the Secretary of State.

Rail Crash (Wrexham)

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the causes of the rail crash at Wrexham General Station on 24 April and place copies of the relevant reports in the Library. [21922]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This accident is still under investigation by the Health and Safety Executive (HSE). Until HSE's investigation is complete, it would not be appropriate to speculate as to the cause of the accident. Information about this accident will be included in HM Chief inspector of Railways Annual Report for 1997–98.

Rail Services

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he is taking to review the terms of reference of the rail regulator in respect of investment by the rolling stock companies; and if he will make a statement. [22155]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government are currently reviewing the regulation of the railway industry as a whole, including the rolling stock companies, which are currently outside the scope of the regulation by the Rail Regulator.

Greater London Council (Building)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how long the GLC Island Block remained empty while in public ownership following the abolition of the GLC; and when, and to whom, it was sold. [22236]

Mr. Raynsford: Following the abolition of the Greater London Council in 1986, County Hall, including the Island Block, was transferred to the London Residuary Body (LRB) who had a remit to dispose of all such surplus property. The whole of the County Hall site was vacated by late 1990, the Riverside Building was sold in October 1993 and the remainder, including the Island Block, was sold to Frogmore Developments plc on 29 March 1995.

Sellafield

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the consultants who are undertaking the independent assessment of the justification for the Sellafield MOX plant commissioning, ordered by the Environment Agency, will be assessing the potential for diversion of plutonium from the MOX plant and from the MOX fuel as part of their study. [22073]

Angela Eagle: PA Consulting Group did not assess the potential for diversion of plutonium from the MOX plant and from the MOX fuel as part of its study because this was outside the specification of the contract with the Environment Agency.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will place in the Library the terms of reference provided by the Environment Agency to the consultants who are undertaking the independent assessment of the justification for the Sellafield MOX plant commissioning. [22071]

Angela Eagle: The contract specification for the assessment of BNFL's Economic and Commercial Case for the Sellafield MOX plant is being placed in the Library. The contract with the consultants, PA Consulting Group, was for an independent assessment of the economic and commercial case for the plant. The Environment Agency will use the consultants' report as an input to its own wider consideration of whether commissioning and operation of the plant is justified, for the purpose of determining the application it has received from BNFL.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will ensure that the independent assessment of the justification for the Sellafield MOX plant commissioning, ordered by the Environment Agency, will, when completed, be placed in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [22074]

Angela Eagle: The publicly available version of the report produced by PA Consulting Group, which excludes material that the Environment Agency has accepted is commercially sensitive, is being placed in the Library.

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what information was provided by sources other than BNFL to the consultants who are undertaking the independent assessment ordered by the Environment Agency of the justification for the Sellafield MOX plant commissioning. [22072]

Angela Eagle: PA Consulting Group undertook its own survey of published data, information and statistics relevant to the business environment for MOX fuel, independently of BNFL. The results of this survey are set out in Appendix C of PA Consulting Group's report, copies of which are being placed in the Library.

MOT Tests

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will review the law which requires MOT testing stations to carry out full re-tests on vehicles re-presented; what assessment he has made of the degree of compliance with this law by testing stations; if he will review the charging and subsidies applied by test centres to re-test customers; and if he will make a statement. [21912]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The law does not require full re-tests in all cases. Testing stations have full instructions about what to do in different cases and the Department's Vehicle Inspectorate monitors compliance with those instructions and disciplinary action is taken where necessary. The maximum fees chargeable for MOT tests are prescribed and are subject to annual review but it is open to testing stations to charge less than the maximum if they wish to do so.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many drivers have been convicted of driving without a road-tax licence since 1 January. [22182]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The number of people successfully prosecuted for Vehicle Excise Duty evasion since 1 January is 208,950. In addition, a further 246,188 who were reported because their vehicles were apparently untaxed paid out of court settlements in lieu of prosecution.

London Underground

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many serious crimes have been recorded on the London Underground during 1997. [22185]

Ms Glenda Jackson: London Underground Ltd. and the British Transport Police take all crime seriously. For the year December 1996 to November 1997 a total of 12,565 notifiable crimes were recorded on the Underground by the British Transport Police. Key categories in this total include:

	Number
Theft from person (pickpocketing)	6,599
Violent or sexual offences	640
Criminal damage	738
Vehicle offences (LUL car parks)	1,391
Robbery offences	462
Serious disorder	226

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the total funding provided by his Department for improvement of the Northern Line in 1997–98. [22184]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department gives grant to London Transport (LT). The distribution of grant by LT between London Underground Ltd. and its other businesses is an operational matter for LT. The Government are providing a total of £759 million grant to LT in 1997–98, including £58 million carry forward from the previous year. I understand that LT plans to invest some £60 million in the Northern Line this year. This investment will be funded by a combination of government grant and LT's internal resources. In addition GEC Alsthom is providing new trains for the Northern Line under a private finance initiative deal.

Circulars

Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will review each of his Department circulars issued to local authorities which are still in force; and if he will make a statement. [21708]

Mr. Raynsford: Each circular issued by my Department is kept under review and updated, amended or replaced when necessary. A one-off review of all the Department's circulars currently in force would therefore be inappropriate and, in any case, would not be feasible on resource grounds.

Bridge Strengthening (Gloucestershire)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how much his Department plans to contribute towards the cost of strengthening bridges in Gloucestershire. [21911]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This financial year the Department plans to spend over £4.8 million on motorway and trunk road bridges in Gloucestershire. This is largely for strengthening works, but also includes some upgrading, maintenance and assessment work. The Department is also contributing nearly £1.5 million to Gloucestershire County Council's programme of bridge strengthening and maintenance works on their local roads.

Rural Development Commission

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will announce his decision on the future of the national advisory role of the Rural Development Commission. [22149]

Mr. Meacher: As soon as possible.

Housing Revenue Account

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will issue the housing revenue account subsidy determination for 1998–99. [22476]

Ms Armstrong: My Department has today sent copies of the Housing Revenue Account Subsidy Determination 1998–99, the Item 8 Credit and Item 8 Debit (General) Determination 1998–99 and the General Determination of Administration of Housing Revenue Account Subsidy (No. 2) 1997 to all local housing authorities in England. These Determinations confirm the proposals sent to authorities on 26 November. Copies of the determinations have been placed in the House Library.

Contaminated Land

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has for the regulation of contaminated land, pursuant to the recommendations made by the Environment Committee in its Second Report of Session 1996–97 (HC22) on contaminated land and the responses received by his Department to consultation on draft statutory guidance and regulations to be issued under Part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. [22491]

Mr. Meacher: We have now reviewed the primary legislation in Part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 (inserted by section 57 of the Environment Act 1995), and the package of draft statutory guidance and regulations published for consultation in September and November 1996. This review has been greatly assisted by the detailed recommendations of the Environment Committee in their Second Report, Session 1996–97, as well as by the more than 400 responses received to the consultation exercises.

We have concluded that this package of primary legislation and guidance sets out, in principle, broadly the right framework for the protection of human health and the environment, without imposing unnecessary burdens on homeowners, landowners, developers or industry. However, it is clear that implementation of the legislation would create significant financial burdens for local authorities and for the Environment Agency. These potential burdens are being considered as part of the Comprehensive Spending Review process, and the decision on when to bring the regime into force will not be made until that process has been completed. In the meantime other relevant legislation, in particular that dealing with statutory nuisances in Part III of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and works to deal with water pollution in Part VII of the Water Resources Act 1991, will remain in force.

My Department, together with the Welsh and Scottish Offices, will continue to develop the package of draft guidance and regulations in the light of the Environment Committee's recommendations and the consultation responses. We have identified a number of areas where there would be a need for changes to the detail of the existing drafts, and I have today written to the Chairman of the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee explaining the more significant of these, as well as responding more generally to the Committee's report. I have also placed in the Library of the House a list of those individuals and organisations which responded to the consultation exercises last year; reference copies of their responses have been placed in the DETR library.

As well as taking forward work on the development of the main regime for contaminated land, I will also be publishing shortly a consultation paper setting out proposals for a parallel regime dealing with radioactively-contaminated land.

Environment Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Environment Council meeting on 16 December, indicating which of the decisions were taken by vote; and whether the council proceedings were held in public. [22127]

Mr. Meacher: I informed the House of the outcome of the Environment Council on 16 December in the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) on 18 December 1997, Official Report, columns 275–76.

A common position was reached unanimously on a regulation establishing common rules and procedures for the export of certain types of Community waste to certain non-OECD countries. As is normal in all Councils, the proceedings did not take place in public.

Task Force on Cleaner Vehicles

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 4 December 1997, Official Report, column 288, if the Minister for the Environment was consulted about the appointment of Mr. Keith Taylor before the appointment was made. [22026]

Mr. Meacher: The membership of the Task Force was a collective decision taken in conjunction with my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in the lead.

Motorway Service Areas

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many public inquiries are currently outstanding on applications for the development of motorway service areas; and what is the estimated cost of these inquiries to (a) his Department and (b) local authorities. [21907]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Four motorway service area planning applications are currently expected to be the subject of public inquiries during 1998. They are as follows: M1 Junction 8/9—Redbourn; M1 Junction 36—Hoyland; M25 Junction 16/17—Warren Farm; and M40 Junction 2—Beaconsfield.

In one further case (M25 Junction 11—Simple Marsh Farm) a public inquiry began in September 1997 but was subsequently adjourned until 1998.

The cost of public inquiries to my Department wil vary widely depending on whether and, if so, to what extent the Highways Agency is required to present evidence on policy or technical issues arising from a particular service area proposal. No central records are kept of the costs of planning inquiries to local planning authorities.

Roads Programme

Mr. Grogan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many representations have been made to his Department regarding each scheme which is being considered as part of the Government's review of the roads programme; and in each case how many were (a) in support of and (b) opposed to the scheme. [22254]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Some 13,000 representations were received in response to the Roads Review consultation exercise, including significant lobbying campaigns in support of some schemes. These representations are being considered, but a detailed analysis in the form requested by my hon. Friend is not available.

SCOTLAND

Departmental Staff

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many (a) special advisers, (b) task force members and (c) review body members his Department employs; what is the total salary and benefits of (a) to (c); and what was the equivalent cost prior to 1 May. [19303]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 10 December 1997]: Since 1 May 1997, my Department has employed two Special Advisers, four Task Force members and two Review Body members. Prior to 1 May 1997, there were two Special Advisers, two Task Force members and one Review Body member. Information on the salary costs to individual departments of Special Advisers is not provided in order to protect the privacy of the individuals concerned. However, information on the total paybill for Special Advisers across Departments was given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in his answer to the hon. Members for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) and for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey) on 25 November 1997, Official Report, columns 472-73. Task Force and Review Body members are individuals other than Departmental officials who may either be paid a salary or fee to work within a specific remit. Many are however unpaid apart from expenses. There was no cost for Task Force members either before 1 May 1997 or since then. Similarly, there was no cost for Review Body members prior to 1 May 1997, but since 1 May fees amounting to £1,026 have been paid.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the names of all those people whom he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed, and whether they receive remuneration. [19966]

1. Reappointments have been counted as appointments.
2. The list includes some appointments which have been announced but have not yet taken effect.

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each person he has appointed since taking office (a) the office to which he has appointed them, (b) the period of office for which they have each been appointed, (c) their political party allegiance and (d) the date of appointment. [21290]

Mr. Dewar [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Information on (a), (b) and (d) is available in the latest edition of the Scottish Office publication "Appointments to Executive Non-Departmental Public Bodies and NHS Bodies", a copy of which is in the Library. Details of appointments will also appear on The Scottish Office website on the Internet (http://www.scotland.gov.uk) from January 1998.

Information on political party allegiance is not collected centrally.

Graduation Statistics

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people graduated from universities in Scotland in (a) arts and humanities, (b) science and technology, (c) medicine and (d) law in (i) 1976, (ii) 1986 and (iii) 1996. [20749]

Mr. Wilson: The available information on graduates from Scottish Higher Education Institutions is given in the following table.

Subject	1986 [1]Universities	1996 [1]Universities	1996 All Higher Education Institutions

[1] Available figures are for the following Universities: Edinburgh, Glasgow, Strathclyde, Aberdeen, Heriot-Watt, Dundee, St. Andrews, and Stirling.
[2] Social Science includes law.
Since 1994–95 data on Higher Education Institutions has been collected by the Higher Education Statistics Agency (HESA). Prior to this date, the data came from the University Statistical Record and returns made to SOED by Further Education Colleges and Colleges of Education. Information for 1985–86 is only available for the Universities covered by the University Statistical Record. There is no available data for 1976.

Mature Students

Mr. Gorrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make arrangements for students aged over 50 years to have access to loans to help them to pay their university or college fees and other costs. [20685]

Mr. Wilson: Under the new student support arrangements for full-time higher education, students aged over 50 will be eligible for means-tested help with tuition fees on the same basis as other students, which means that if they are on low incomes they will continue to receive free tuition.

Under the current student loans scheme, full-time students who are aged 50 or over when their course starts are not eligible for a loan and we do not plan any changes in those arrangements for academic year 1998–99. We will, however, be reviewing the position for future years in the context of the move to 100 per cent. loans for maintenance. Both full-time and part-time students in higher education will be eligible for Access Funds from academic year 1998–99, regardless of their age.

East Lothian District Council

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland on what date the Controller of Audit's Special Report 97/2 on East Lothian District Council was submitted to (a) the Accounts Commission and (b) East Lothian Council. [20987]

Mr. Macdonald: I understand from the Accounts Commission for Scotland that the Controller of Audit's report was dated 27 August 1997 and was sent to the Accounts Commission and East Lothian Council on that date.

Controller of Audit Reports

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list instances in each of the last five years where the Controller of Audit has made a special report in circumstances where the authority in question had an audit certificate which was unqualified in respect of the matters raised in the report. [21003]

Mr. Macdonald: The Accounts Commission for Scotland have provided the following information:

SR93/2 on Dumbarton District Council: Payments to Anti Poll Tax Organisations

SR97/2 on East Lothian District Council: Payments to a Trust

Section 102 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973 gives the statutory function of reporting on the accounts of local authorities to the Controller of Audit. There is no requirement that special reports under section 102 should be restricted to instances where accounts have been qualified. Under section 102(3) the Controller of Audit is obliged to report

"having considered any matter arising out of the auditing under his part of this Act of the accounts of any local authority and having made such further enquiries (if any) as he may think fit."

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the public local inquiries conducted by the Accounts Commission arising from special reports by the Controller of Audit for each year since 1992, giving the cost of each inquiry. [20989]

Mr. Macdonald: The Accounts Commission for Scotland has the power to hold hearings under section 103(2) of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973. I understand from them that hearings have been held as follows:

1992: 1—Western Isles Council

1993: 0

1994: 0

1995: 0

1996: 0

1997:1—East Lothian District Council.

The costs of holding hearings are not separately identified. They are part of the overall performance of the Commission's statutory functions, and there have been no additional costs in relation to officers' or members' remuneration.

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the special reports by the Controller of Audit submitted to the Accounts Commission in each of the years 1992–93 to 1996–97, giving (a) a brief description of each and (b) the final decision of the Accounts Commission in each case. [20988]

Mr. Macdonald: The Accounts Commission for Scotland have provided the following information.

Special reports were submitted as follows:

Number	Date	Title	Description	Decision
SR93/2	8 October 1993	Dumbarton District Council: Payments to Anti Poll Tax Organisations	Legality of payments to organisations campaigning against poll tax.	No action
SR96/1	10 January 1996	Lothian Regional Council Apportionment of Costs of Collecting Water Tax in 1993–94	£4.8 million debited to the wrong account	The accounts did not present fairly the financial position of the authority and the accounts for 1995–96 should be prepared on a different basis
SR96/2	1 February 1996	Lothian Regional Council Apportionment of Costs of Collecting Water Tax in 1994–95	£3.8 million debited to the wrong account	As above.

In addition, a number of general and public interest reports have been issued over that period.

Meat Retailers

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to require (a) supermarkets and (b) other retail outlets to notify customers of the country of origin and age of the animals in the case of all fresh and frozen meat sold by them. [21803]

Mr. Macdonald: None but, subject to Parliamentary approval, a voluntary Beef Labelling Scheme will be introduced on 1 April 1998. Retail outlets will not be required to label fresh or frozen beef or veal under the Scheme, but retailers will, with the prior approval of my Department, be able to use labels which give a wide range of information, including information as to the Country of origin, age of the cattle etc. If the information contained on the labels is confined to basic advice such as weight, cut, use by date, then Government approval is not needed.

Set-aside Schemes

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what acreage of (a) Scotland and (b) Perthshire is included in set-aside schemes; what is the current cost to public funds of set-aside schemes in (a) and (b); and what percentage of land under farming in Scotland is included in set-aside. [21638]

Mr. Macdonald: The area of set-aside claimed in Scotland under the 1997 Arable Area Payments Scheme (AAPS) is 41,049 hectares and represents 4.19 per cent. of the arable land shown in the June 1997 Agriculture Census. Scottish farmers will receive an estimated £11 million in set-aside aid in respect of this claimed area. The AAPS is not administered on a county basis and information is not held in this way.

Orkney and Shetland

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many times he has visited Orkney and Shetland since 2 May. [22039]

Mr. Dewar: Since 2 May I have visited Orkney twice. I have not yet visited Shetland.

Beef Export Ban

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the occasions on which the Under-Secretary with responsibility for agriculture has (a) attended and (b) spoken at meetings of the European Council of Ministers regarding the ban of the export of beef from Scotland. [21646]

Mr. Macdonald [holding answer 19 December 1997]: My noble Friend the Minister for Agriculture, the Environment and Fisheries in Scotland has attended two Agriculture Councils. He has not spoken on the subject of the ban on the export of beef from Scotland as this did not feature on the agenda for either meeting.

Lockerbie

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received about the UN visit to inspect the Scottish legal system in relation to Lockerbie. [21901]

Mr. Dewar: None.

Training Agencies

Mr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement as to the outcome of his recent discussions with European Commissioner Flynn anent the delayed ESF payments to training agencies and providers in Strathclyde and elsewhere in Scotland. [22066]

Mr. Macdonald: My right hon. Friend met Commissioner Padraig Flynn on 1 December to discuss, among other things, a report completed by a Working Group of Scottish European Structural Funds partnerships on European Social Fund procedures. My right hon. Friend said that the Group had presented a useful commentary on problems which have arisen in relation to ESF funding, and on providing suggested improvements to the ESF system. He was able to confirm that The Scottish Office and Scottish partnerships have already implemented many of the most important recommendations in the report. Nevertheless there are other improvements which it would be helpful to achieve; and my right hon. Friend stressed that it would assist significantly if the Commission's services were able to make changes to their systems to allow funding to be released promptly.

Several of these improvements can only be achieved when the structural funds Regulations are revised for the period after 1999. However, my right hon. Friend asked the Commissioner to take any opportunities available before then to improve the system.

Social Work (Training)

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements will be made in Scotland following the fundamental review of the functions of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work. [22471]

Mr. Galbraith: The Government have today published the fundamental review of the functions of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work (CCETSW). I and my hon. Friends will be considering in detail the conclusions and recommendations in the report. The report paves the way for the creation of regulatory machinery which would combine regulation of the workforce with the regulation of social work education and training. I have thought carefully about whether it would be appropriate for this machinery to have a UK-wide remit or whether it should be separate and specific to Scotland. I have concluded that, in view of the differences in legislation, the scope of social work services which includes criminal justice social work, existing devolved structures for higher education and vocational training and the considerable support expressed by Scottish respondents to the CCETSW review for separate arrangements, the weight of the argument points towards a separate Scottish body. However, it will be essential, and in the pubic interest, that the regulatory arrangements should be aligned across the UK. I would not want to create a situation where there are significant disparities in standards or practice in relation to registration. Officials across UK departments will work together to ensure harmonious regulatory arrangements across the UK.

This will, of course, require legislation and I intend that legislative proposals should be published in a separate Scottish White Paper in the spring after discussion of the detailed issues within Government and with all the key stakeholders.

I have thought it right to clarify these issues in order to minimise uncertainty and allow sensible planning and preparation for the establishment of a new body. The Scottish Committee of CCETSW and its staff in Scotland will continue to make an important contribution in achieving an appropriately qualified and trained workforce and, alongside other stakeholders, will be able to contribute to discussions leading to the setting up of a new regulatory body. I have asked the Chief Inspector of Social Work Services to commence direct discussions with key stakeholders in the New Year.

Scottish Homes

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to ensure that local authorities have greater involvement in the transfer of Scottish Homes stock. [22472]

Mr. Macdonald: On 16 June, the Government announced new arrangements for Scottish Homes stock transfers to ensure that councils are much more directly involved in the transfer process in future. These included proposals to ensure that landlords intending to acquire Scottish Homes stock must be prepared to accept a local authority nominee on to its management committee if that is what the local authority wishes. This arrangements was brought into immediate effect and has been working well.

At the same time, COSLA and Scottish Homes were asked to get together to work arrangements to strengthen the role of local authorities in the assessment of future stock transfer proposals. These bodies have now produced joint guidance which has been issued today to all local authorities. The guidance sets out in detail how councils can be involved in the appraisal process and, depending on the stage which transfers have reached in the process, involves the council in the development local strategies and the appraisal of transfer proposals. These new arrangements will also give councils the opportunity to make their views known before a final decision on any particular transfer is sought.

I welcome and endorse the joint guidance which will allow for constructive liaison and discussion between Scottish Homes, councils and other parties to achieve proposals which have the backing of all concerned. It will also enable councils to satisfy themselves that transfer proposals are aimed at meeting the needs and aspirations of the tenants involved. Tenants' interests are paramount and I would emphasise that the final decision on any particular transfer will lie with the tenants themselves.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has for the regulation of contaminated land, pursuant to the recommendations made in the Environment Committee's Second Report of Session 1996–97 on contaminated land (HC 22) and the responses received by his Department to consultation on draft statutory guidance and regulations to be issued under Part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. [22475]

Mr. Dewar: We have now reviewed the primary legislation in Part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 (inserted by section 57 of the Environment Act 1995), and the package of draft statutory guidance and regulations published for consultation in September and November 1996. This review has been greatly assisted by the detailed recommendations of the Environment Committee in their Second Report, Session 1996–97, as well as by the more than 400 responses received to the consultation exercises.

We have concluded that this package of primary legislation and guidance sets out, in principle, broadly the right framework for the protection of human health and the environment, without imposing unnecessary burdens on homeowners, landowners, developers or industry. However, it is clear that implementation of the legislation would create significant financial burdens for local authorities and for the Scottish Environment Protection Agency. These potential burdens are being considered as part of the Comprehensive Spending Review process, and the decision on when to bring the regime into force cannot be made until that process has been completed. In the meantime, other relevant legislation, in particular that dealing with statutory nuisances in Part III of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and works to deal with water pollution in Part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, will remain in force.

My Department, together with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the Welsh Office, will continue to develop the package of draft guidance and regulations, in the light of the Environment Committee's recommendations and the consultation responses. We have identified a number of areas where there would be a need for changes to the detail of the existing drafts, and my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment has today written to the Chairman of the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Committee explaining the more significant of these, as well as responding more generally to the Committee's report. A list of those individuals and organisations which responded to the consultation exercises last year has been placed in the Library of the House.

As well as taking forward work on the development of the main regime for contaminated land, I will also be publishing shortly a consultation paper setting out proposals for a parallel regime dealing with radioactively-contaminated land.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Living Allowance

Mr Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will make a statement on her proposals to reform disability benefit. [21006]

Mr. Denham: We are committed to modernising the Social Security system so that it helps people to work as far as they are able; provides appropriate support to those who cannot work; and makes the most effective use of the resources available. We want to encourage people who are disabled, or who have long-term health problems, to play a full part in society and to help them to help themselves wherever that is possible. This means being positive about people's abilities and their capacity, rather than negative about their disabilities and incapacity. And it means getting the right mix of cash and services to people who cannot work, but who need to be enabled to live independently and with dignity.

As part of this process up to £195 million has been made available from the Windfall Tax to test a range of options to help people with long-term health problems or disabilities to move into, or remain in, work. In tandem with this developmental work we are reviewing, as part of our Comprehensive Spending Review, benefits paid to sick and disabled people in order to consider whether the current system meets our objectives and, if not, what changes might be made.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will list for each year since 1991–92 the number of claimants of (a) disability living allowance (care), (b) disability living allowance (mobility) and (c) attendance allowance; and for each year what was the total expenditure broken down between benefit payments and administration costs expressed (i) in cash terms and (ii) at September 1997 prices. [22159]

Mr. Denham: The administration of Social Security benefits is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Terry Rooney, dated 22 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to respond to your recent parliamentary question asking if she will list for each year since 1991–92 the number of claimants of (a) disability living allowance (care), (b) disability living allowance (mobility) and (c) attendance allowance; and for each year what was the total expenditure broken down between benefit payments and administration costs expressed (i) in cash terms and (ii) at September 1997 prices.

The information regarding admin expenditure is not available in the format requested. The information that is available is detailed in the table.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what assessment she has made of the length of time it takes to review cases in which disability living allowance has been withdrawn; [22056]

(2) if she will expedite the review of the case of Mrs. N. L. Underwood of 82 Juniper Road, Christchurch in respect of disability living allowance. [22067]

Mr. Denham: The administration of Disability Living Allowance is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with further details.

Letter for Peter Mathison to Mr. Christopher Chope, dated 22 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions concerning the length of time it takes to review cases in which Disability Living Allowance (DLA) has been withdrawn.

The current Secretary of State targets for clearing DLA review claims are 60 per cent. within 55 working days and 80 per cent. within 75 working days. These targets have been set to take account of the fact that reviews can take time to complete, because the review process frequently involves gathering further information. As at November 1997, the DLA review year to date achievement is 62.41 per cent. in 55 working days and 84.89 per cent. in 75 working days.

Mrs. Underwood of Christchurch was awarded the Highest rate of the Mobility Component from 17.12.93 to 16.12.97. On the 10 October 1997 a completed renewal claim pack was received from Mrs. Underwood. On 29 October 1997, an independent Adjudication Officer (AO) decided that, on the basis of the information provided by Mrs. Underwood, she did not satisfy any of the conditions for an award of the mobility component.

On the 25 November a letter requesting a review was received from Mrs. Underwood which also provided further information. On the 5 December 1997 a report was received from Mrs. Underwood's consultant, Dr. Moran, Department of Rheumatology. On receipt of this further information the papers were passed onto a different AO who re-appraised the case and decided that Mrs. Underwood did satisfy the conditions for an award of the Higher Rate of the Mobility Component from 17 December 1997. Mrs. Underwood was informed of the revised award by telephone on the 18 December 1997.

I hope you find the reply helpful.

Benefits (Peterlee and Seaham Area)

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parents are in receipt of the lone parent premium in the Peterlee and Seaham Benefits Agency area. [21590]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The administration of Income Support is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. John Cummings, dated 22 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many lone parents are in receipt of the lone parent premium in the Peterlee and Seaham Benefits Agency (BA) area.

The information is not available in the format requested. Statistics are collated by BA District Offices. These Districts do not correspond to constituency boundaries or specific geographical areas.

The BA's Durham District includes the offices of Durham, Chester-Le-Street, Peterlee, Seaham and Stanley. The number of people in receipt of Income Support (IS) lone parent rate of family premium in the Durham District, as at 30 November 1997, was 9,968. This figure is provisional and maybe subject to change. It should also be noted that this figure does not represent all those lone parents who are on IS, as some who are over pensionable age or who sick may be receiving a higher rate premium, such as a pensioner or disability premium and so do not take up the lone parent rate of family premium.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the number of people in the age bands of (a) 30 to 40, (b) 40 to 50, (c) 50 to 60 and (d) 60 to 70 years who are in receipt of disability living allowance in the Seaham and Peterlee Benefits Agency area. [21591]

Mr. Denham: The administration of Social Security benefits is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. John Cummings, dated 19 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent parliamentary question asking for the number of people in receipt of Disability Living Allowance (DLA) in the Seaham and Peterlee Benefits Agency (BA) area.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she plans to maintain the present establishment of Child Support Agency field officers working from Benefits Agency offices in Elgin, Wick and Inverness; and if she will make a statement. [21842]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to the hon. Member.

We expect the Child Support Agency to provide an efficient and effective service to all its clients throughout the child support assessment process. We are looking for substantial and sustained operational improvements from the Agency, in particular on getting more maintenance paid, reducing the backlog and improving customer service.

Letter from Mike Isaac to Mr. Robert Maclennan, dated 19 December 1997:

In the absence of Mrs. Boardman, the Chief Executive, I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about Chid Support Agency field officers working within the Benefits Agency offices in Elgin, Wick and Inverness.

It may be helpful if I explain some of the background to the current situation.

In line with the Government's commitment to modernise service delivery, the Agency has recently conducted a major review of its business to enable it to deliver a service which is more customer focused and more cost effective. Although we are still working on a detailed analysis, it is clear that the size of our field network will significantly reduce over the next three to four years.

The staff who continue to work outside the Agency's Centres will be there to offer a much improved face to face service with our customers where necessary. This will not only support the Agency's business but will allow the Agency to operate improved customer service initiatives within our six Centres. The review has also shown that the Agency needs to improve its interface with and be more accessible to customers.

The Agency is currently reviewing the precise nature of jobs in our field network to ensure that staff who remain there are used in the most cost effective way. This review will also consider the location of field offices. Business Unit Mangers will be consulting and negotiating with staff on an on-going basis to resolve these issues. As yet no decisions have been taken on the future of the three sites mentioned in your question.

I hope this is helpful.

War Pensions Agency

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many medical advisers are currently employed by the War Pensions Agency; and what are their function; [21882]

(2) how many regional consultants are currently appointed by the War Pensions Agency. [21883]

Mr. Denham: One of our key aims is that delivery of service should be simpler and more efficient. Queries on operational matters concerning the War Pensions Agency are for its Acting Chief Executive, Mr. Steven Johnson. I have asked him to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Steve Johnson to Mr. Ken Livingstone, dated 19 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions about Medical Advisers and Regional Consultants working for the War Pensions Agency.

There are 33 full time Medical Advisers currently employed by the War Pensions Agency. In addition, the Agency employs a number of Medical Advisers on an hourly, fee paid basis to provide flexibility to deal with fluctuations in workload.

All Medical Advisers are fully qualified medical practitioners who have a broad range of post graduate clinical experience. Most full time Medical Advisers have been recruited from General Practice.

The role of the Medical Adviser is to determine, in accordance with the provisions of article 4 or 5 of the Naval, Military and Air Forces etc. (Disablement and Death) Service Pensions Order 1983, whether disablement or death is due to service, or whether disablement is aggravated by service, and to give reasons for such decisions. Medical Advisers also determine in accordance with Article 9 of the Order, the degree of disablement due to service.

Where it is established that service factors played a part in the cause or progress of claimed conditions, Medical Advisers provide certificates of entitlement. Medical Advisers then certify percentage assessments of the degree of disablement due to service. The Medical Advisers also provide advice to the Secretary of State regarding eligibility to a range of supplementary allowances, for example in respect of care and mobility needs.

Regarding Regional Consultants, although the War Pensions Agency is the sole user of Regional Consultants, the Agency is not responsible for making appointments. Regional Consultant appointments are made by the Chief Medical Adviser to the Department of Social Security. At present, 412 Regional Consultants have been appointed nationally.

I hope you find this information useful.

Benefit Claimants (Coventry)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are claiming (a) disability benefit and (b) lone parent benefit in (i) Coventry and (ii) Coventry, South. [21793]

Mr. Denham: The administration of disability and lone parent benefits is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 22 December 1997:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many people are claiming (a) disability benefit and (b) lone parent benefit in (i) Coventry and (ii) Coventry South.

Information is not available for all relevant benefits in the format requested.

The number of people in receipt of Attendance Allowance (AA) and Disability Living Allowance (DLA) is set out below:

	AA	DLA
Coventry	6,800	12,000
Coventry South	1,900	3,700

These figures are based on a 5% extract of the caseload at the end of August 1997 rounded to the nearest hundred.

The number of people in receipt of Incapacity Benefit (IB) is 9,859 and the number of people in receipt of Severe Disablement Allowance (SDA) is 1,914. The figures for IB and SDA are those in receipt at the end of November 1997 and the figures are for the area covered by the Benefits Agency's Coventry District.

The information for Industrial Injuries Disablement Benefit (IIDB) is not available in the format requested. The nearest breakdown is for the West Midlands. The number in receipt of IIDB for that area is 25,800. This figure is based on a 10% extract of the caseload at the end of March 1996 rounded to the nearest hundred.

The information for lone parent benefits could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

CSA (Coventry)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total outstanding debt to the CSA from absent parents in (a) Coventry and (b) Coventry, South. [21795]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The Government believe that children are entitled to the support of both parents. The Child Support scheme is designed to provide levels of maintenance which absent parents can realistically afford.

The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Mick Davison to Mr. Jim Cunningham, dated 22 December 1997:

In the absence of Mrs. Boardman, the Chief Executive I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about outstanding debt to the Child Support Agency.

I am unable to provide information at precisely the level that you have requested. Information on outstanding debt is available for the 6 Business Units of the Agency which cover Great Britain; Coventry is part of the area covered by the Midlands Business Unit.

At 30 November 1997 the amount of debt remaining to be collected was £130,940,569 for this Business Unit.

I hope this is helpful.

Lone Parents

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals her Department has for measures to protect the welfare of lone parents in those cases where maintenance debt has been considered irrecoverable by the CSA. [21797]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The regular payment of child maintenance is a key part of our strategy for helping lone mothers move off income support and into work. However, there will inevitably be some cases where it proves impossible for the Child Support Agency to collect the arrears of maintenance which are due, particularly where the debt arose through the imposition of punitive interim maintenance assessments designed to secure the absent parent's co-operation. However, a decision not to pursue the debt in an individual case will be made only after all reasonable steps to enforce payment have been taken and after full consideration of all the circumstances of the absent parent, the parent with care and the welfare of the children involved.

Where the parent with care is entitled to income support or family credit her benefit will be assessed on the basis of maintenance in payment, not maintenance due to be paid.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what proportion of lone parents are receiving regular payments of child maintenance in (a) Coventry and (b) Coventry, South. [21794]

Mr. Keith Bradley: It is not right that so many fathers should seek to avoid paying maintenance. We are determined to ensure that all absent parents meet their responsibility to their children wherever they can afford to do so.

The information is not available in the format requested. The latest information shows that, where full maintenance assessments have been completed for absent parents to pay maintenance through the Child Support Agency, 33 per cent. are paying all the maintenance due, 35 per cent. are partially compliant and 32 per cent. are not complying.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress is being made in conjunction with the Child Support Agency in ensuring that lone parents receive regular maintenance payments. [21796]

Mr. Keith Bradley: We are looking closely at all aspects of the work of the Child Support Agency to see where improvements can be made and we aim to bring forward proposals in the first half of next year. In the meantime, we have already announced that an extra £15 million will be invested in the Agency in each of the next two financial years specifically aimed at increasing the amounts of maintenance which are paid.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if she will list for the eight pilot new deal for lone parents schemes from July 1997 to 15 December 1997 how many (a) letters were sent out to lone parents, (b) lone parents attended interviews or booked interviews, (c) lone parents agreed to continue to participate following an interview, (d) lone parents found jobs following agreement to participate, (e) lone parents failed to respond to the initial letter sent to them and (f) lone parents declined to participate following an interview with a personal adviser. [21853]

Mr. Keith Bradley: The information is not available in the format requested as sufficient data to evaluate the results of the New Deal for Lone Parents are not yet available, and conclusions cannot be drawn from early figures. A full report of the New Deal for Lone Parents will be published in 1999.

Information on the operation of the New Deal for Lone Parents is available up to and including 30 November.

As at 30 November 1997, 12,446 first invitations have been issued to lone parents; 4,454 initial interviews have been arranged, of which 3,049 lone parent interviews have taken place; 2,402 lone parents agreed to participate in the New Deal for Lone Parents programme following initial interviews; 864 lone parents have found jobs following agreement to participate in the New Deal for Lone Parents programme.

Information on the number of lone parents who have failed to respond to initial letters is not available from the Management Information Statistics reports kept on New Deal for Lone Parents. However, Personal Advisers will follow up initial letters with further contacts.

Six hundred and forty seven lone parents declined to participate in the New Deal for Lone Parents programme following an interview with a personal adviser.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost of a maintenance disregard of (a) £5, (b) £10, (c) £15 and (d) £20 for lone parents in receipt of income support in the current year; and what are the projected costs for (i) 1998–99, (ii) 1999–2000 and (iii) 2000–01. [22162]

Mr. Keith Bradley: Child support is a central part of the Government's strategy for helping lone mothers off income support and into work. The estimated costs of a maintenance disregard in income support are set out in the table:

Weekly disregard (£)	Estimated cost (£ million)
	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01
5	15	55	60	65
10	20	95	100	110
15	30	130	140	150
20	35	150	170	185

1. All costs rounded to the nearest £5 million.
2. The estimated costs for this year are based on an assumed introduction of the disregard at the beginning of January 1998.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the total budget of her Department for each year since 1987–88 split between benefit payments and running costs expressed (a) in cash terms, (b) at September 1997 prices and (c) as a percentage of total Government expenditure. [22167]

Statutory Maternity Pay

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate she has made of the savings in the current year from restricting statutory maternity pay to earnings of (a) £15,000, (b) £20,000, (c) £25,000, (d) £50,000 and (e) £100,000; and what would be the projected savings in (i) 1998–99 and (ii) 1999–2000. [22163]

Mr. Denham: No estimates have been made.

Motability

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations she has received from the Disabled Drivers Association regarding the Motability scheme. [21913]

Mr. Denham: The Disabled Drivers Association (DDA) met my noble Friend the Under-Secretary, Baroness Hollis on 26 November. The DDA raised various motions carried at their Annual General Meetings in 1996 and 1997 relating to the mobility component of Disabled Living Allowance and the Motability Scheme.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans she has to ensure that cold-weather heating cost payments for the elderly will be paid in time to meet the needs of pensioners whose charges are met through pre-payment key meters; what regulations will apply to the payment of cold-weather heating allowances; and if she will make a statement. [21906]

Mr. Denham: Cold Weather Payments will be triggered when the average temperature at specified weather stations has been recorded as, or is forecast to be, 0 degrees centigrade or below over seven consecutive days. People awarded Income Support or income-based Jobseeker's Allowance who have a pensioner or disability premium or have a child under the age of five are eligible for help and payments will be made automatically.

In paying Winter Fuel Payments, priority will be given to pensioners receiving Income Support. The precise provisions which will apply will be made known when the regulations are laid.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what were the (a) projected savings and (b) actual savings for each year since inception of incapacity benefit; and what are the projected savings in each of the next three years. [22165]

Mr. Denham: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the table.

Correspondence

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the Child Support Agency expects to reply to the letter of 27 October from the hon. Member for Aylesbury relating to case 1012119700. [21919]

Mr. Keith Bradley: We are determined to ensure that the Child Support Agency provides an efficient and effective service to all its customers, including their representatives.

The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for the Chief Executive, Mrs. Faith Boardman. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mike Isaac to Mr. David Lidington, dated 22 December 1997:

In the absence of Mrs. Boardman, the Chief Executive, I am replying to your Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security about a reply from the Child Support Agency to your letter of the 27 October relating to case 1012119700.

The letter was received by the Midlands Business Unit on 30 October and a response was sent by the Business Unit Manager on 11 December. Please accept my apologies as this failed to meet the Departmental standard to reply to MP correspondence within 20 working days.

I hope this is helpful.

Pension Review

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what measures she will be taking in the course of the Government's pension review to provide a more flexible decade of retirement for pensioners aged 55 to 65 years. [22064]

Mr. Denham: Our pensions review is looking at the central areas of insecurity for elderly people, including all aspects of the basic pension and its value. We received over 2,000 responses to the first part of the review which ended on 31 October, which we are carefully considering. We intend to publish an initial framework for change in the first half of 1998. There will then be a period of further consultation before firm proposals are developed.

Child Benefit

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the receipts generated by taxing child benefit at the top rate. [21587]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: I have been asked to reply.

If child benefit were taxed, the yield for 1998–99 from taxing it as part of the father's or lone mother's income would be about £1,400 million. If it were taxed as part of the mother's or lone father's income, the yield would be about £700 million.

TREASURY

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what millennium-related computer problems have occurred to date at (a) the Inland Revenue and (b) the Treasury; and if he will make a statement. [21555]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 18 December 1997]: The Inland Revenue and the Treasury have a rolling programme of work under way to ensure all affected IT systems are Year 2000 compliant. To date no millennium related computer problems have occurred at the Inland Revenue. Two central computer systems at the Treasury have suffered a Year 2000 problem. One system was corrected and a temporary solution is in place for the second pending the planned installation of a compliant version of the software.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if his estimate of the costs of resolving the millennium computer problem include the costs relating to the embedded chip problem; and if he will make a statement. [21556]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 18 December 1997]: The managing agents of the Treasury buildings have been instructed to identify those embedded systems that might be affected by the millennium computer problem and to recommend courses of action. Resource estimates for remedial action will be made on the basis of those recommendations.

Business Profits

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the Inland Revenue's practices of permitting some professional businesses to work out their profits for tax purposes on a cash basis. [22436]

Dawn Primarolo: I have today authorised the Inland Revenue to withdraw the practices which permit some professional businesses to pay tax on profits worked out on a specially favourable basis (the "cash" basis). This will level the playing field for all businesses and correct an anomaly for which there is no justification. It is fully in line with the Government's objective of a fair and equitable tax system.

The proposals, which will affect tax due for 1998–99 and later years, are set out in an Inland Revenue Press Release. Comments are invited by 14 February 1998.

Tax Information

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will update the information given in the July 1996 Tax Ready Reckoner and Tax Reliefs booklet. [22437]

Mr. Gordon Brown: The Treasury is today publishing a booklet containing estimates of the effects of various illustrative tax changes on tax revenues in 1998–99 to 2000–01 and preliminary estimates of the costs of the main tax reliefs in 1996–97 and 1997–98. Copies are being placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Government Debt and Cash Management

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how he plans to transfer the responsibility for Government debt and cash management from the Bank of England to the Treasury. [22438]

Mr. Gordon Brown: The Treasury issued a consultation paper on the future of UK Government debt and cash management on 29 July 1997. The Government's response to the consultation exercise is being published today. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House. The Treasury will establish an agency, to be known as the United Kingdom Debt Management Office, which will operate in accordance with an annual published remit but be at arms length from the Treasury for the purpose of day-to-day decision making. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has agreed that this should be a candidate to become a Next Steps Agency.

Government and Business Investment

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of (a) business investment and (b) Government investment in the United Kingdom. [19158]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Recent developments and prospects for the level of both business and general government investment in the UK were reviewed in Appendix A of the November 1997 Pre-Budget Report (Cm 3804, paragraphs A.34 to A.38).

Savings

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what regulations will apply to new retailers of financial products in respect of the ISA schemes with particular reference to supermarkets; what additional compliance costs will be involved; and who will bear these costs; [21352]

(2) what proposals he has to institute a "cooling off" period for those taking up new ISAs. [21337]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 17 December 1997]: The regulatory authorities will make proposals on these matters once the form of the ISA has been decided.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) on what basis he calculated his estimate of the number of people with PEP and TESSA investments in excess of £50,000; [19766]

(2) what estimate his Department had of the number of people with PEP and TESSA investments with a combined value of more than £50,000 when they announced their proposal for individual savings accounts. [19765]

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his current estimate of the total number of individuals who presently hold personal equity plans and tax exempt special savings accounts who will be affected by the new £50,000 limit on individual savings accounts; what margin of error is involved in this estimate; and if he will make a statement. [20398]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The estimate of between 300,000 and 500,000 people with PEP and TESSA investments in excess of £50,000 by April 1999 is based on an interpretation of survey data and information supplied by some major PEP providers. The estimate is necessarily tentative as TESSA and PEP investors are not required to supply the Inland Revenue with any information about their investments, and individual providers would not have information on investments made by their clients with other providers.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what assessment he has made of the effect on the housing market of the abolition of PEPs and the introduction of individual savings accounts with a maximum holding of £50,000, with particular reference to PEP mortgages; [19767]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of people who hold PEP mortgages in excess of £50,000. [19768]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Discussions with major mortgage providers suggest that by April 1999 the vast majority of PEPs used for mortgage purposes would be worth less than £20,000. One major provider of PEP mortgages has stated that £50,000 of equity-linked savings within an ISA over a 25 year period should be sufficient to fund a mortgage of some £125,000. Couples will therefore be able to benefit from an ISA each to cover repayment of a mortgage of up to £250,000. Any effect on the housing market is expected to be negligible.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the basis of what market research he estimated that there would be six million new individual savings account savers. [19770]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: It is hoped that six million people may open new individual savings accounts. This represents the expected number of accounts which could be opened within about three years of their introduction by those who currently do not have a PEP or TESSA. This estimate takes account of an analysis of people with interest from bank and building society accounts which is subject to income tax (i.e. interest on savings held outside of TESSAs) from the Inland Revenue Survey of Personal Incomes.

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the amount of extra tax revenue to be raised in each of the first three years after implementing the plans outlined in his consultative document about individual savings accounts. [19705]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 8 December 1997]: The costs of introducing individual savings accounts as set out in the consultative document and are expected to be broadly similar in the first three years to the estimated cost of PEPs and TESSAs, if these schemes were to continue with their current tax reliefs.

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the relative average costs of the administration of (a) PEPs, (b) TESSAs and (c) ISAs by their providers. [19675]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 8 December 1997]: In designing the Individual Savings Account we have sought to replicate so are as possible existing PEP and TESSA procedures, and we intend to keep costs to ISA providers as small as possible.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his estimates of the net revenue yield to the Treasury for each of the years (a) 1998–99, (b) 1999–000, (c) 2000–01, (d) 2001–02 and (e) 2002–03 of the proposals contained in his recent consultative paper in relation to the introduction of the individual saving account and the associated restrictions relating to the monetary value of personal equity plans and tax exempt special savings accounts which can be transferred into the ISA; and if he will make a statement. [19755]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 10 December 1997]: The costs of introducing individual savings accounts as set out in the consultative document and are expected to be broadly similar in the first three years to the estimated cost of PEPs and TESSAs, if these schemes were to continue with their current tax reliefs. There may be a small effect for 1998–99 if the proposals encourage people to open TESSAs, or some PEP savers whose savings exceed the overall limit of £50,000 choose not to subscribe additional funds.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the policy of the Government in relation to the integration of tax relief on individual savings accounts with that on the proposed stakeholder pensions; and if he will make a statement. [19954]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 10 December 1997]: The individual savings account (ISA) and the stakeholder pension are intended to be different but complementary products. The stakeholder pension involves a commitment to lock money away until retirement, while the ISA gives investors greater access to their money.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the estimated loss of tax relief to the Treasury if all PEP investors were to make the full contributions currently permissible into private pension plans. [21350]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: This information is not available. The estimated cost would depend on the individual circumstances of each PEP investor, and information on the pension provision of PEP holders is not available centrally. Many PEP investors will not be in a position to secure tax relief for contributions as they may be retired or at their contribution limit, and others will be saving for purposes other than retirement income and would wish to have access to their funds.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the current average value of PEP plans into which the full maximum annual instalments have been made since inception. [21349]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Assuming annual growth in line with the Financial Times Actuaries All-Share Index. the current value of the maximum subscription of £82,200 by 1997–98 is estimated at around £150,000, before allowing for the effects of charges and reinvestment of dividends.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what factors underlay his decision to hold a monthly prize draw for holders of ISAs. [21507]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: A priority for the new individual savings account (ISA) is to increase the attraction of tax free saving to many of those who do not save at the moment. The proposed prize draw is intended to offer people an additional incentive to save through the ISA.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the importance of marketing in support of ISAs. [21506]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Marketing by individual savings account (ISA) providers will clearly be important in encouraging take-up of ISAs, as it is at present with PEPs and TESSAs. The ISA proposals are intended to encourage a diversity of providers such as existing PEP providers, banks and building societies, insurers and friendly societies and retailers such as supermarkets.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates he has made of the net income to individuals on equity investments up to the maximum permissible annual limit proposed in ISAs based on a current average FT Allshare index yield; and what would be the full taxable amount saved by basic rate saver taking up such a scheme. [21338]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 17 December 1997]: Assuming the current gross dividend yield of around 3.2 per cent., an individual savings account would provide an annual income of £142 in the first year for every £5,000 invested in UK equities, of which £128 would be paid as net dividends, and £14 as a 10 per cent. tax credit. In addition capital gains will be tax exempt.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the number of people likely to have more than £50,000 in PEPs and TESSAs on (a) 1 April and (b) 1 October 1999. [21336]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 17 December 1997]: It is estimated that between 300,000 and 500,000 people may have PEP and TESSA investments in excess of £50,000 by April 1999. This estimate is based on an interpretation of survey data and information supplied by some major PEP providers. The number at 1 October will depend on the pattern of transfers into individual savings accounts.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reasons direct gilt holdings are not to be qualifying investments under the ISA proposals. [21353]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson [holding answer 17 December 1997]: Under present proposals gilt-edged securities could qualify for inclusion in an individual savings account (ISA) as part of the investments of a UK authorised unit or investment trust or open ended investment company (OEIC). If direct holdings of gilts were eligible they would fall most naturally into the cash component of the ISA. But it must be recognised that gilts are not really designed for small purchases of up to £1,000 a year (the contribution limit for the cash component).

Offshore Assets

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the tax revenue to the Treasury if all assets held offshore by British citizens were taxable under United Kingdom law. [21042]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The information is not available.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the total money lost to the Exchequer in (a) income tax on dividends, (b) inheritance tax and (c) capital gains tax by the use of offshore trusts in each of the last five years. [21048]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 17 December 1997]: This information is not available.

Income Tax

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect of (a) introducing a 10 pence starting rate of tax on the first £1,000 of taxable income and (b) spending the same amount on increasing non-aged personal allowances while holding the top of the 20 pence band at its present level, on individuals with gross weekly income of (i) under £100 per week, (ii) £100 to £149 per week, (iii) £150 to £199 per week and (iv) £200 per week or more. [19033]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 4 December 1997]: It is estimated that, in 1998–99, introducing a new 10p starting rate on the first £1,000 of taxable income would cost the same as increasing non-aged personal allowances by about £400. Information is not available on the Survey of Personal Incomes on gross weekly income, therefore annual total income has been used instead. Average annual gains are given in the table.

Range of annual total income (£)	Average annual gains (£) New 10 pence rate[1] on first £1,000 of taxable income	Increase non aged personal allowances by £400
0–5,200	50	60
5,200–7,800	90	80
7,800–10,400	100	90
10,400+	100	100

[1]Assuming that the new 10 pence band would apply to all taxable income, so that the rates for savings income would be 10 per cent., twenty per cent. and 40 per cent.

Disability Benefits

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the revenue from subjecting each of the main non-taxed disability benefits to income tax. [19261]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 5 December 1997]: The estimates requested by the hon. Member, which are published annually in Inland Revenue Statistics are given in the table below for 1998–99:

Benefit	Yield in a full year from taxing benefit £ million
Incapacity benefit[1]	400
Disability living allowance	325
Attendance allowance	250
Industrial disablement benefits	80
Severe disablement allowance	25
Disability working allowance	10

[1] Incapacity benefit is exempt from tax for the first 28 weeks of payment, and for claimants previously on Invalidity Benefit.

VAT on Domestic Fuel (Pensioners)

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the average weekly monetary gain for a pensioner couple in each income decile, and with average expenditure on domestic fuel for the respective decile, for 1998–99, accruing from (a) the reduction in VAT on domestic fuel from eight per cent. to five per cent. (b) the reduction in the uprating for pensions and other state benefits consequent on the reduction of VAT on fuel from eight per cent. to five per cent. and (c) the announcement on 25 November of extra help towards pensioner heating costs. [19271]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 9 December 1997]: The extra help announced by the Chancellor in his pre-budget statement amounts to £50 for pensioner households on income support, and £20 to other pensioner households. These winter fuel payments will be paid both this winter and next. Given the purpose of these payments, it makes little sense to break these figures down into weekly amounts.

For the reduction in VAT, net of the effect on uprating of pensions the average weekly cash gain for married pensioner households, by income decile, is given in the table below:

	VAT reduction from 8 per cent. to 5 per cent. net of effect on uprating of pensions	As a percentage of net household income
Bottom	0.35	0.20
2	0.25	0.15
3	0.25	0.10
4	0.25	0.10
5	0.25	0.10
6	0.25	0.05
7	0.30	0.10
8	0.40	0.10
9	0.40	0.05
Top	0.60	0.05
Average	0.30	0.10

The information is based on Family Expenditure Survey data, for married pensioner households. The cash figures in the table have been rounded to the nearest 5p, the percentages have been rounded to the nearest 0.05 per cent. Due to rounding the results for the VAT reduction and the effect on pensions may not sum to the figure in the total column.

Taxation

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his present estimate of the tax burden as a per cent. of GDP, using total taxes and social security contributions on a national accounts accruals basis, for each year from 1996–97 to 2001–02; what is his estimate of the additional annual taxation in cash terms which is projected to be raised by the Exchequer in 2001–02 as a result of the increase in the tax burden over this period; and if he will make a statement. [19757]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 10 December 1997]: Projections of the tax burden, assuming unchanged tax policies, were presented in Table B6 of the Pre-Budget Report. The projected increase in the ratio of taxes and social security contributions to GDP from 1996–97 to 2001–02 is equivalent to a total increase in tax receipts of £23 billion at current prices in 2001–02, compared with 1996–97. This is equivalent to an average annual increase of £4½ billion.

The primary aim of the Government's tax policy is to raise sufficient revenue for Government to pay for the services which its policies require, and to service its debt, while keeping the overall burden of tax as low as possible.

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total amount of (a) income tax, (b) capital gains tax, (c) corporation tax, (d) inheritance tax and (e) VAT paid for each of the last 10 fiscal years expressed (i) in cash terms, (ii) at September 1997 prices and (iii) as a percentage of general Government receipts. [22160]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Figures in cash terms up to 1995–96 were published in Table 10.25 of Public Finance Trends 1996. Figures for 1996–97 were published in Table S24 of Financial Statistics (October 1997 Edition). Figures for the GDP deflator were published in Table 1.1 of Economic Trends Annual Supplement 1996–97. Forecasts of the GDP deflator were published in Table A3 of the November 1997 Pre-Budget Report.

Economic and Monetary Union

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 27 November 1997, Official Report, column 658, on facilitating the use of the Euro, if he will introduce measures to require banks to remove exchange costs between Euro and Sterling. [21094]

Mrs. Liddell: When the euro is introduced in a number of the other EU member states in January 1999 it will be a foreign currency in the UK and will fluctuate in value against sterling. The Government have no plans to require banks to bear the exchange costs that will remain between the euro and sterling in such circumstances. However, the Government will develop with the banking sector a "seal of approval" so that firms and individuals can recognise those banks which offer reliable information and which allow customers to bank in euro at low cost.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the loan from the European Investment Bank to Railtrack for infrastructure improvement will count in the investment taken into account when calculating the percentage of gross national product deficits relating to Economic and Monetary Union convergence requirements; on what criteria this decision is based; and what rate of interest the Exchequer requires for comparable public investment. [21686]

Mr. Darling: A loan made by the European Investment Bank to Railtrack would not affect General Government Financial Deficit (GGFD), Gross National Product (GNP) or Gross Domestic Product (GDP).

The calculation of GGFD and GDP when providing data for the assessment or progress against the convergence criteria for Economic and Monetary Union is made in accordance with the European System of Accounts.

For comparable public investment, a return on assets of 8 per cent. in real terms is normally expected on commercial activities by public sector trading bodies.

High Tech Start-ups

Mr. Horam: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 16 December 1997, Official Report, column 106, on finance for high tech start-ups, if he will list the membership of the high level group mentioned in the reply. [22360]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: I am sponsoring a group examining the financing of high-technology companies, particularly in the start-up stage. This group is being chaired by Dr. Keith McCulloch, Chief Executive of British Biotech plc. The other members of the Group are as follows:

Dr. Peter Williams—Executive Chairman, Oxford Instruments plc;

Mr. Geoff Lindey—Head of UK Institutional Investment, JP Morgan;

Mr. David Quysner—Managing Director, Abingworth Management Ltd;

Mr. Derek Higgs—Chief Executive, Prudential Portfolio Managers;

Sir David Cooksey—Chairman, Advent Ltd;

Mr. Peter Meinertzhagen—Chairman, ABN Abro Hoare Govett;

Mr. Peter Agar—Deputy Director General, Confederation of British Industry;

Mr. Mike Smith—Head of Business Finance Division, Bank of England;

Dr. Herman Hauser—Director, Amadeus Capital Partners Ltd;

Mr. Richard Regan—Head of Investment Affairs, Association of British Insurers;

Ms Christine Soden—Finance Director, Chiroscience plc;

Mr. Ian Armitage—Mercurey Asset Management Group plc;

Mr. Craig Pickering—Head of Industry Team, HM Treasury;

Dr. Alistair Keddie—Director of Innovation Unit, Department of Trade and Industry.

The group aims to identify barriers that exist in relation to the financing of high technology companies, and has been asked to make practical proposals within six months.

Far East

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the impact of the financial crises (a) in Japan and (b) elsewhere in Asia on prospects for the UK's gross national product growth in 1998; and if he will make a statement. [21103]

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of market turbulence in the Far East on his Department's projections for gross domestic product growth in the United Kingdom over the next three years. [21342]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 17 December 1997]: The financial crisis in East Asia to date is not expected to have a major impact on the growth of the UK economy. However, the situation is still evolving, and the risk of further deterioration and significant global effects mean that developments need to be kept under close review.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect the Government's commitment to provide up to 1.25 billion dollars in financial support to Korea will have on the previously published figures for the public spending reserve for other contingencies which might arise in 1997–98 and 1998–99; and if he will make a statement on the adequacy of the provision he has made for the reserve. [21707]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 19 December 1997]: The UK, together with a number of other countries, has agreed to consider providing further financial support to Korea, of up to $1.25 billion. As the Chancellor announced on 3 December this will be made available only if unanticipated circumstances create the need to supplement resources provided by the International Financial Institutions, while Korea remains in compliance with IMF arrangements. This does not affect the previously published figures for the public spending reserves. Public spending would only be involved if the loan was drawn down by Korea and the Treasury guarantee given to the Bank of England was called in the event of Korean default on repayments.

Alcohol Duty

Mr. Alan Clark: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to equalise the excise duty levied upon sparkling wine, still wine and fortified wine. [21623]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: We have no current plans to change the current duty structure. However, any representations made to do so will be given careful consideration in the run up to the next Budget.

Internal Migration

Mr. Tom King: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what inter-departmental machinery exists to ensure that estimates of future internal migration in the United Kingdom accurately reflect current forecasts of regional employment prospects; and if he will make a statement. [21780]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Tom King, dated 22 December 1997:

The Chancellor of the Exchequer has asked me to reply, as the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), to your recent question on estimates of future internal migration.

An inter-departmental National Population Projections Committee advises the Government Actuary's Department about migration flow assumptions between the four constituent countries of the United Kingdom when national population projections are prepared.

When preparing sub-national population projections for England, the ONS consults local and health authorities (through the Department for Environment Transport and the Regions, and the Department of Health respectively) to prepare assumptions about future migration for local areas. The Welsh Office and General Register Office for Scotland consult their respective countries.

For both national and sub-national projections, the migration assumptions for the future are based upon past trends. These will reflect past changes in employment prospects and other factors associated with migration. They will therefore not reflect policy based forecasts of regional employment.

Hotel and Catering Industry

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many and what percentage of people employed in the hotel and catering industry earn less than (a) £3, (b) £3.50, (c) £4, (d) £4.50 and (e) £5 per hour in (i) London, (ii) the rest of England, (iii) Scotland, (iv) Wales and (v) Northern Ireland. [22089]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Chief Executive of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 15 December 1997, Official Report, column 1, if he will publish the figures for the cyclically adjusted current balance as a percentage of GDP. [21643]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 19 December 1997]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 16 December 1997, Official Report, columns 103–04.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Rendering Effluent

Ms Walley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will list those rendering plants in England and Wales currently receiving specified bovine offal and set out for each plant (a) the effluent treatment and (b) the effluent receiving environment; [20339]

(2) what plans he has for additional controls in respect of the discharge of effluent and its disposal routes; and if he will make a statement. [20340]

Mr. Rooker: Those rendering plants in England and Wales currently receiving specified bovine material are as follows:

Granox Ltd.

Peninsular Protein

J. L. Thomas

Thruxted Mill

Fats and Proteins (UK) Ltd.

J. G. Pears

Gilberts Animal by-Products.

Controls on effluent from rendering plants are a matter for the relevant regulatory body—the relevant water services company for discharges to sewers or the Environment Agency for discharges to environmental waters, i.e. rivers. Approvals to process specified bovine material are issued subject to any conditions on control of effluent which the relevant regulatory body may judge necessary in individual circumstances.

Animal Feed

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in what circumstances it is permissible to give feed containing animal offal to herbivorous farm animals in the United Kingdom and to sell such feed for export. [20365]

Mr. Rooker: The BSE (No. 2) Order 1996 prohibits the feeding of mammalian protein (including that derived from mammalian offal) to ruminants. It also prohibits the feeding of mammalian meat and bone meal (MMBM) to all farmed livestock (including any equines and fish). This Order also prohibits the sale or supply of ruminant feed containing mammalian protein and livestock feed containing meat and bone meal, and imposes strict controls on the production and sale of feeding stuffs for livestock to ensure that it cannot be contaminated with mammalian meat and bone meal. The export of MMBM is prohibited by the Bovines and Bovine Products (Despatch Prohibition and Production Restriction) Regulations 1997. No export health certification for exports of MMBM was available after the introduction of the export ban on 27 March 1996.

The Specified Bovine Material Order 1997 prohibits the feeding of specified bovine material (SBM) to any creature. It also prohibits the use of SBM in the manufacture of feedingstuffs and the sale of feedingstuffs containing SBM. This legislation will be replaced on 1 Janaury 1998 by the Specified Risk Material Regulations 1997 and the Specified Risk Material Order 1997. There are no such restrictions on the feeding of non-mammalian offal (e.g. poultrymeal or fishmeal) to herbivores, providing it has first been processed to appropriate standards.

There is an exemption from each of these prohibitions to allow the feeding of mammalian protein, mammalian meat and bone meal and specified risk material to animals for research purposes in research establishments licensed for the purpose by a MAFF veterinary inspector.

Beef Sales

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what restrictions will apply in Britain to the sale of British beef which do not apply to imported beef after 1 January 1998. [20361]

Mr. Rooker: The specified Risk Material Order 1997, which comes into force on 1 January 1998, will require imported beef from cattle over 12 months old to be accompanied by a declaration that it does not contain skull (including brain and eyes), tonsils or spinal cord. Imports from Australia and New Zealand will be exempt from this requirement.

Beef from cattle aged six months or over, which have died or been slaughtered in the UK, must not contain head (excluding the tongue), spinal cord, spleen, thymus, tonsil and intestines.

BSE

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the numbers and grades of civil servants, special advisers and other employees and advisors to his Department, who have been (a) dismissed and (b) reprimanded as a result of their advice or work on the BSE crisis within the Department since 1986. [20488]

Dr. John Cunningham [holding answer 12 December 1997]: No staff in the core department have been dismissed or reprimanded as a result of their advice or work on the BSE crisis.

Disciplinary matters in the Meat Hygiene Service are a matter for its Chief Executive and I have asked him to write direct.

Letter from Johnstone McNeill to Mr. Paul Keetch, dated 22 December 1997:

As Chief Executive of the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) your Parliamentary Question to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food about the number and grades of employees who have been dismissed or reprimanded as a result of their advice or work on the BSE crisis since 1986 has been passed to me for reply with regard to this Executive Agency.

The Meat Hygiene Service was established as an Executive Agency of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (MAFF) on 1 April 1995. It is responsible for enforcing meat hygiene, inspection and animal welfare at slaughter legislation in licensed fresh meat premises in Great Britain.

The MHS is also responsible for enforcing specified bovine material (SBM) controls and other BSE related controls in licensed premises. It does this most rigorously. A comprehensive SBM controls training programme has been provided to all inspection staff. The Agency's staff are fully aware that they may face disciplinary action as a result of any failure to enforce these controls.

To date 48 MHS employees have been subject to disciplinary investigation. The employees are broken down by numbers, grade and disciplinary action as follows:

Disciplinary Action	Number	Grade
Dismissed	4 (1 reinstated on appeal)	Meat Hygiene Inspectors
Formal disciplinary warnings	21	Official Veterinary Surgeons (2) Meat Hygiene Inspectors (19)
Formal written cautions	23	Official Veterinary Surgeons (5) Meat Hygiene Inspectors (18)

Staff who have faced disciplinary action undergo a retraining programme prior to resuming work at a plant. Such staff are required to repeat the intensive practical plant based SBM training under the supervision of a Principal Official Veterinary Surgeon. The importance of 100% compliance with SBM is reiterated to these staff and they continue to be closely monitored by the plant's OVS to ensure comprehensive and rigorous enforcement of SBM controls.

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Health of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on the basis of what current scientific advice he has distinguished between the infectivity with regard to BSE of bovine dorsal root ganglia and (a) peripheral nervous tissue in muscle adjacent to vertebrae and (b) other autonomic nervous system ganglia. [20113]

Mr. Rooker: The advice which SEAC gave me was based on experimental findings of infectivity in the dorsal root ganglion, the spinal cord, the brain, the trigeminal ganglion, the distal ileum and the bone marrow of animals at various stages in the development of BSE after experimental infection. In these experiments infectivity has not so far been detected in a wide range of other tissues including the stellate ganglion, nodose ganglion, sciatic nerve, facial nerve and the phrenic nerve. Other nervous tissues have not been tested in this experiment. The experiment is, however, continuing and SEAC will review the evidence and its guidance in the light of any new results.

Modulation

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on modulation. [21029]

Mr. Rooker: The Government would oppose any Commission proposals to modulate subsidies under the Common Agricultural Policy which discriminated against the United Kingdom as a consequence of its farm structure or efficiency.

Arable Area Payments

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Health of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the average time taken by his Department to make arable area payments to farmers following receipt of final notification to the farmers by the relevant regional office of his Department. [21027]

Mr. Rooker: At present, the average time between notification to the farmer that a payment under the Arable Area Payment Scheme has been authorised, and the despatch of the payment to the farmer, is seven days. The Department expects to make all main payments under the Scheme in England, except those subject to query, by the EU deadline of 31 December 1997.

Risk Management Research Programme

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will place in the Library the findings of his Department's Risk Management Research Programme for the last five years. [21195]

Dr. John Cunningham [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Final reports from all projects, including those in the Risk Management Programme, are lodged in the Department's Library where members of the public have access to them.

Beef on the Bone

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the degree of consensus within SEAC on (a) each of the recommendations made and (b) other advice given to his Department on bone-in beef; and if he will list the areas of disagreement within SEAC. [20771]

Dr. John Cunningham [holding answer 16 December 1997]: I have made a statement to the House and published SEAC's advice to me. One member, Dr. Watson, was unable to attend the meeting due to a previous engagement but the advice I have received represented the consensus view of all the members of the Committee who attended the meeting.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the risk of an individual developing new variant CJD from eating beef on the bone sold recently. [20767]

Dr. John Cunningham [holding answer 16 December 1997]: The risk for an individual eating beef sold in 1997 cannot be calculated with certainty. However, the median value of exposure per person in 1997 has been estimated with 95 per cent. confidence to be about 1 billionth of an ID50 unit. (Where an ID50 unit represents the amount of infectivity, that would cause disease in half the population exposed to that dose.)

Meat and Meat Products

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further measures he is evaluating which would have the effect of restricting consumer choice in respect of meat and meat products. [21196]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 16 December 1997]: Our priority is consumer safety and maintenance of public confidence in food. We continue to keep all aspects of food safety under review and will not hesitate to take firm and decisive action where that is necessary to achieve those objectives.

We are reluctant to restrict consumer choice and do so only on safety grounds and factors relating to public confidence in our food supply.

Cattle Traceability Scheme

Sir George Young: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to assist farmers with the start-up costs of the cattle traceability scheme. [21377]

Mr. Rooker: Final decisions on any Government contribution have not yet been taken.

Farm Support

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to provide additional funding for (a) lowland farming, (b) middle hill farming and (c) steep hill farming. [21495]

Mr. Rooker: Any additional funding would have to be provided within the framework of the rules of the Common Agricultural Policy. We are considering what might be appropriate and affordable in the current circumstances. An announcement will be made shortly.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the approximate value of support provided by agricultural support funds of the European Community for (a) cereals and (b) livestock in the latest year for which figures are available. [21688]

Mr. Rooker: Support in the European Union in 1996 from the Guarantee section of the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund in respect of cereals was 12.1 billion ecu and for livestock and livestock products was 12.2 billion ecu. In addition these sectors would have benefited from agricultural structural measures (e.g. Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances) part-financed by the Guidance section of the Fund.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much was spent from public funds in support of agriculture in (a) 1970–71 and (b) 1971–72 in 1996 prices in (i) pounds and (ii) ecus. [21690]

Mr. Rooker: The information is as follows:

	(a) £ million	(b) mecus
(i) 1970–71	2,070	2,490
(ii) 1971–72	2,380	2,870

Mr. Hayes: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much farmers in other EU member states received in agri-monetary aid payments in the last year for which figures are available; and what proportion of this total has been funded by the UK. [21609]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 18 December 1997]: Nine other Member States have been eligible to pay compensation to their farmers to offset the effects of green rate revaluations since the compensation arrangements were first established in 1995. Since then, payments to farmers have totalled around 720 mecu.

Around 530 mecu of the total so far paid will be reimbursed to Member States from the EU budget, to which the UK—in common with other Member States—contributes. The UK contributes about 15 per cent. to the total EU budget, although the effect of the Fontainebleau abatement means that in practice the UK contributes only about five per cent. to new expenditure in other Member States.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total support for United Kingdom agriculture provided by the funds of the European Community in 1996 in (a) pounds and (b) ecus. [21689]

Mr. Rooker: Expenditure from the Guarantee section of the European Agricultural Guidance and Guarantee Fund in the United Kingdom in 1996 was £2.9 billion (3.5 billion ecu) and a further £78 million (94 million ecu) was paid from the Guidance section of the Fund. Expenditure on UK agriculture was about nine per cent. of the EU total.

Beef Farming

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many beef farmers there were in (a) Scotland, (b) England, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland at the most recent date for which figures are available. [21758]

Mr. Rooker: Figures taken from the 1996 June Agricultural Census are shown in the following table.

	Number of beef farms	Number of beef farmers[1]
Scotland[2]	15,219	n/a
England	58,921	76,837
Wales[3]	15,478	20,041
Northern Ireland[4]	22,444	26,498

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much public money was spent to support beef farming in the last year for which figures are available. [21757]

Mr. Rooker: Financial support (both direct and indirect) to beef farming made by the Agriculture Departments and the Intervention Board during the financial year 1996–97 amounted to £2,091.3 million. This was made up as follows:

	£ million
Non-BSE related

Cereals

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what response his Department has (a) made and (b) plans to make to representatives from the National Institute of Agricultural Botany about the funding of complimentary national list trials for cereals. [21682]

Mr. Rooker: Ministers have agreed that Government funding of complementary trials in support of the National Institute of Agricultural Botany (NIAB) Recommended List should cease with effect from 1 April 1998, and the Department's officials have so informed NIAB.

My Noble Friend the Parliamentary Secretary has also written to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) explaining the position more fully and has offered to meet her and representatives from NIAB to listen to their views.

Imported Meat

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures are in place to ensure that imported meats meet United Kingdom health standards, with particular reference to the provisions relating to deboning. [21685]

Mr. Rooker: All fresh meat produced in the UK, and imported into the UK from other EU Member States, must be produced in accordance with harmonised Community rules laid down in Council Directive 64/433/EEC. Fresh meat imported from third countries must come only from approved establishments in countries which are authorised by the European Commission to export to the Community. These controls are designed to ensure that the meat satisfies health requirements equivalent to those applying within the Community.

From 16 December 1997, imported bone-in beef will, under the Beef Bones Regulations 1997, be subject to the same rules as beef produced in the UK.

EU Deficiency Payments

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will propose to the European Commission a system of deficiency payments for staple marketable crops and livestock produced in areas of climatic disadvantage. [21687]

Mr. Rooker: No. I consider the CAP should be reformed so that EU farmers are more exposed to market signals, the overall cost of the policy is reduced and payments to farmers decoupled from production and targeted towards specific environmental and structural goals. A system of deficiency payments would not be consistent with these objectives.

Beef Prices

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the average price of beef (a) on the world market and (b) in the United Kingdom in each quarter of each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [21759]

Mr. Rooker: There is no unique measure of the world price for beef. The information in the table is indicative of general trends in recent years.

The Government consider that reform of the beef regime of the Common Agricultural Policy is essential. A necessary element in this reform is a reduction in the support price for beef as recently suggested by the European Commission as part of the Agenda 2000 package.

Beef

Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will take steps to encourage the procurement of British beef for (a) those serving in the Armed Forces, (b) hospital patients and (c) children taking school meals. [21923]

Mr. Rooker: Government Departments and Local Authorities are generally required to look for the best value for money in their procurement decisions, and we would contravene the Treaty of Rome by operating a "Buy British" Policy.

In addition, the Department is neither well placed nor sufficiently resourced to lobby the Local Authorities directly about the procurement of beef.

Whaling

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the scientific purposes which have been accepted by the IWC as reasons for the hunting of whales. [21655]

Mr. Morley: Under the International Convention for the Regulation of Whaling (the IWC's parent convention) a contracting party may issue special permits allowing its nationals to kill whales for purposes of scientific research. The IWC has no power to regulate the issue of special permits. However, in a resolution adopted in 1995, the IWC recommended that scientific research involving the killing of cetaceans should be permitted only in exceptional circumstances where the questions address critically important issues which cannot be answered by the analysis of existing data and/or use of non-lethal research techniques. At its meeting in Monaco in October this year, the IWC adopted a further resolution affirming that in its view current Japanese special permit whaling does not address critically important research needs. This criticism was supported by the UK.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what response the Government have made to the recent statement by the Irish Government with regard to the lifting of the world-wide moratorium on commercial whaling. [21630]

Mr. Morley: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Stourbridge (Ms Shipley) on 28 October 1997, Official Report, column 789.

Fishing Quotas

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the extent to which (a) the Norwegians and (b) the Japanese are exceeding their scientific quota catch. [21631]

Mr. Morley: Only Japan currently issues special permits for scientific whaling. In 1997 the Japanese Government authorised the killing for research purposes of 440 minke whales in the Southern Ocean and 100 in the North Pacific; it reported to the IWC that 440 were actually killed in the Southern Ocean and 77 in the North Pacific.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimated financial loss caused by fraud within each EU state, in respect of the Common Agricultural Policy. [21887]

Mr. Rooker: Undetected fraud cannot, by definition, be measured and, for this reason, neither the Commission nor the European Court of Auditors has provided an estimate of the level of fraud within the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP). Member states are, however, required to report detected CAP irregularities over 4,000 ecu (1996 = £3,395) to the Commission. In this context, the definition of irregularity includes all overclaims, negligence or fraud. In 1996, member states reported 1944 cases of irregularity valued at £169 million—0.5 per cent. of the CAP budget of £32.5 billion. A breakdown by Member State was shown in the Commission's Annual Report: "Protecting the Community's Financial Interests: The fight against fraud" and is provided in the table:

Meat Labelling

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the existing regulations on the labelling of meat with the country of origin as they relate to (a) the country where the animal was produced, (b) the country where the animal was slaughtered and (c) the country where the carcase was cut. [22075]

Mr. Rooker: There are no specific requirements for this information to be given on food labels.

The Food Labelling Regulations 1996 contain general provisions requiring the place of origin to be given, if omitting it could mislead the purchaser about the true origin of a food.

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his Department's mechanisms for reviewing policy in respect of genetically engineered crops. [21788]

Mr. Rooker: The Department has a number of mechanisms for reviewing policy in this area. We seek a wide range of views through informal meetings with consumer, environmental and industry groups, well-publicised public consultations and discussions and workshops attended by invited scientific experts. We also obtain expert advice from our own independent scientific advisory committees and through cross-membership of these committees with those advising the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions.

Fisheries Council

Mrs. Humble: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Fisheries Council held in Brussels on 18 and 19 December; and if he will make a statement. [22179]

Mr. Morley: I represented the United Kingdom at the meeting of the Fisheries Council in Brussels on 18–19 December, together with my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland.

The Council agreed by qualified majority, with Ireland voting against, the total allowable catches and quotas to apply in 1998 in Community waters.

Throughout the negotiations, I stressed the need to be guided by the advice of the scientists and to be cautious in our management of fish stocks while at the same time taking account of the practical realities and economic needs of fishermen. I believe that the final package struck that balance.

In order to conserve stocks, TACs were reduced where necessary. In other cases, where the state of stocks justified it, TACs were increased. At the end of the negotiations, the total UK quotas agreed for the stocks of most importance to our fishermen were some 26,000 tonnes higher in cod equivalent terms than the quotas being discussed at the start of the negotiations. This increase is worth approximately £11 million to the industry and means our total quotas in cod equivalent terms for these stocks are five per cent. above the 1997 level. Higher quotas for some stocks combined with the fleet reductions which have been taking place should increase the profitability of our fishermen.

I invoked the Hague Preference on all stocks where it was necessary to do so.

I am very pleased to say that the agreement included a new TAC for sandeels and new allocations for five other North Sea stocks. These new controls will limit uptake in some sensitive fisheries and their establishment represents a significant advance in conservation. Moreover, I secured changes which greatly improved the UK's share of the TACs for North Sea sprat and herring by-catches.

As well as for the first time introducing a catch limit on sandeels in the North Sea, the Council agreed further restrictions on industrial fisheries by reducing the TAC set for herring by-catches in industrial fisheries.

The Council did not agree the new North Sea TACs proposed for anglerfish, megrim, turbot, mixed flatfish, and skates and rays. It did, however, make a commitment to reach agreement on these TACs by 30 March 1998 and, in order to avoid irresponsible fishing, the Council and Commission agreed our suggestion that no fish caught after 1 January 1998 will count towards track records under the new TACs.

Within the package, there was agreement to the allocation of the Western waters horse mackerel TAC in which I secured an increase in the UK's share from 8.28 per cent. to 9.81 per cent.

I also succeeded in securing an increase to 22.9 per cent. as the United Kingdom's share of the TAC for Atlanto-Scandian herring. This will replace the 19.85 per cent. share imposed on the UK at the April Fisheries Council.

The Council agreed unanimously to access and quota arrangements for 1998 with neighbouring non-Member States. Declines in the stocks managed by Norway mean that Community and UK fishing opportunities have been reduced at North Norway. We have, however, retained our quotas in Faroese, Greenland and Iceland waters at the same levels as in 1997.

The Council also agreed unanimously to the allocation of the Community's 1998 quotas in the waters covered by the North-West Atlantic Fisheries Organisation, together with technical conservation and control measures applicable to those waters, and to the allocation of the Community's redfish quota in the waters covered by the North-East Atlantic Fisheries Commission, together with management measures for those waters.

In order to implement commitments made in the International Commission for the Conservation of Atlantic Tunas, the Council agreed unanimously to the introduction of TACs for bluefin tuna and swordfish.

The Commission presented a paper reviewing the marketing of fisheries products which will be discussed during the UK Presidency next year.

Ms Ryan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's objectives for the multi-annual guidance programme (MAGP IV) now adopted by the European Commission and announced on 17 December. [22478]

Mr. Morley: The Commission announced on 17 December that it had adopted the objectives for all 13 maritime Member States, details of which are to be published shortly in a series of Commission Decisions addressed to the Member States concerned.

The full table applying to the United Kingdom which we expect to appear in the Official Journal is reproduced as follows:

DR = Depletion risk.

OF = Overfished.

[1] Includes estimated GT values in accordance with article 4 of the present Decision. The objectives will be revised as real GT values become available.

[2] The objectives for 2001 for these fisheries are based on the levels of effort in 1996 and 1997. These objectives are subject to review in the light of the development of the fisheries.

[3] The capacity objectives for 1996 have been increased by 2,108 GT, representing 45 per cent. of the backlog from the MAGP III.

[4] The capacity objectives for 1996 have been increased by 1,782 GT and 11,914 kW, representing 45 per cent. of the backlog from the MAGP III.

[5] Vessels fishing at least half the time in external waters. The capacity objectives for 1996 have been increased by 560 GT and 1,357 kW, representing 45 per cent. of the backlog from the MAGP III.

[6] Vessels fishing exclusively outside EU waters. The objectives for this fishery are provisional and may be revised within the provisions of Article 8 of Council Decision 97/413/EC.

The figures do not take account of the expected take up of decommissioning grants under the 1997 Scheme, nor of other changes in the fleet register since the end of 1996, notably in the pelagic segment. When allowance is made for these factors, the effective reductions now required to meet the MAGP IV objectives are currently estimated as follows:

Estimated rates of reduction required to implement the UK's objectives for MAGP in the light of the current UK fleet position and projected take up of 1997 decommissioning scheme

Pelagic trawls and purse seines	North Sea herring	36 per cent. effort reduction
	Western pelagic	29 per cent. effort reduction

BSE and nvCJD

Ms Ryan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the Government will institute an inquiry into bovine spongiform encephalopathy and new variant CJD; and if he will make a statement. [22477]

Dr. John Cunningham: Since the announcement by the then Secretary of State for Health and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in this House on 20 March 1996, Official Report, columns 375–96 of the probable link with a new variant of Creutzfeldt-Jakob Disease, there have been many calls for a public inquiry into Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy. These calls come from consumer opinion and from the scientifc community, as well as from the families of nvCJD patients, for whom the Government have the deepest sympathy. Comparisons have been drawn with the full investigations which follow transport accidents and major commercial failures affecting the public, whose human and economic implications are often much less.

Further to the statement I made earlier today the Government have decided to invite Lord Justice Phillips to carry out a non-statutory inquiry with the following terms of reference:

"To establish and review the history of the emergence and identification of BSE and nvCJD in the United Kingdom, and of the action taken in response to it up to 20 March 1996; to reach conclusions on the adequacy of that respnse, taking account of the state of knowledge at the time; and to report on these matters by 31 December 1998 to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Secretary of State for Health and the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland."

In carrying out the inquiry, Lord Justice Phillips will be supported by a scientific assessor and by an assessor experienced in public administration.

This will be a non-statutory inquiry, whose main purpose is to establish facts and the respective roles of a range of commercial players and public authorities, not to lay blame at the feet of individuals. The Government urge all concerned to co-operate fully with the inquiry; and will of course expect serving and retired public officials to do so.

The inquiry will begin its work early in January. Parties wishing to make representations to the inquiry can write to them at 3 Whitehall Place, London, SW1A 2HH.

EU Contributions

Mr. Gale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list, for each of the years since the singing of the Fontainebleau Agreement, the amount that the United Kingdom has saved in contributions to the EU arising from the terms of the treaty. [22152]

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: I have been asked to reply.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Training

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to improve training and educational opportunities for seasonally unemployed individuals who do not qualify for the New Deal programme. [21318]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Department of Education and Employment is currently considering the future pattern of education and training for unemployed people as part of its Comprehensive Spending Review.

A history of seasonal work does not, of itself, indicate a need for intensive help such as training. The Government's Welfare to Work programmes, on the other hand, are particularly intended to help those who face most disadvantage in returning to work.

There are, however, many other sources of help on which seasonally unemployed people, who do not qualify for Welfare to Work programmes can draw. All unemployed people have access to the help and advice of the Employment Service from day one of unemployment, including the job broking service and advice on seeking employment. After three months, unemployed people are given help to broaden their job search through, for example, interviews with employment advisers and job search plus courses. Help with travelling to interviews can also be given at this stage.

In addition, many flexible learning opportunities exist for people who are subject to seasonal or irregular employment, for example through part-time opportunities in further education colleges. TECs may make provision for training and enterprise measures to suit local circumstances, such as seasonal unemployment. Unemployed seasonal workers are subject to the same Jobseeker's Allowances (JSA) rules on education and training as other unemployed people, and can therefore study part-time as long as they remain available for and actively seeking work.

Domestic Workers

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the types of employment for which overseas domestic workers can seek employment within the United Kingdom. [21381]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Work permits are not approved for overseas domestic workers. Overseas domestic workers, other than the domestic staff of diplomatic missions, can be allowed entry to accompany their employer under a concession outside the Immigration Rules for which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has responsibility. They do not have the right to change their employment.

English Literature Examination Results

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish an analysis of grades achieved in English Literature in 1997 examinations including a breakdown of each English examining board's modular results. [21596]

Dr. Howells: The information requested in respect of GCE A levels is shown in the following table.

Employment Programmes

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will provide a breakdown of expenditure expressed (a) in cash terms and (b) at September 1997 prices and the number of starts for each Government employment programme since 1987; and what are the projected figures for 1998–99. [21520]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 18 December 1997]: Details of the expenditure and starts for each employment programme delivered by the Employment Service for which information is available are set out in the following table. Expenditure is given in cash terms and at the latest available prices July 1997. Projections for individual programmes for 1998–99 are still under discussion with the Employment Service.

Overseas Doctors

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many applications were (a) received and (b) granted from overseas doctors for work permits in the last year for which figures are available. [21874]

Mr. Alan Howarth: A total of 965 work permit applications for overseas doctors were recorded as received in the financial year 1996–97. A small proportion of these were appeals against an earlier refusal and relate to the same individual. The number of applications approved was 888.

Tourism

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the relationship between tourism and jobs in rural areas. [22020]

Mr. Andrew Smith: No such assessment has been made by this Department. The Government recognise the importance of the tourism industry to the national economy, in rural and urban areas alike.

Further Education

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if students in the full-time education and training option within the New Deal for those aged 18 to 24 years will have greater income than other students in further education. [22112]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Young people in the Full-Time education and Training option of the New Deal for 18–24 year olds will receive an allowance equivalent to their usual benefits, including any passported benefits to which they may be entitled. Information on the average income of other students in further education is not held centrally, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Higher Education

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what will be the total level of his Department's budget, in 1995–96 prices, for higher education in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99; if he will estimate what such figures would be for (i) 1997–98 and (ii) 1998–99 on the basis of the estimates of the gross domestic deflator contained in the November 1996 Budget; and if he will make a statement. [21110]

Dr. Howells: The total level of the Department's budget for higher education in 1997–98 at 1995–96 prices is £6.091 billion. Planned provision for 1998–99 at 1995–96 prices is £6.112 billion. Comparable figures using the GDP deflators contained in the November 1996 Budget are £6.129 billion and £6.219 billion respectively.

Access and Foundation Courses

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the purpose of access and foundation courses, and on their relationship to higher education. [22103]

Dr. Howells: Access Courses are courses of further education which prepare students for entry to higher education. They provide mainly for mature students without conventional entry qualifications, who have the ability to benefit from higher education but do not yet feel ready for entry. They also help the needs of specific groups in the community identified as under-represented in higher education.

Foundation courses provided by higher education institutions are less well defined. Sometimes they are offered by higher education institutions as a conversion facility for students whose qualifications are not appropriate for the subject to be studied. Sometimes they are a "Year 0", a preparation for degree programmes.

Circulars

Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will ensure that Education Circular 23/94 is amended to require comments on objections to a change of a local education authority education scheme are sent to him as a matter of course and that local education authorities take serious consideration of objections. [22259]

Mr. Byers: As Circular 23/94 makes clear, where Local Education Authority (LEA) proposals to reorganise the pattern of educational provision attract statutory objections, those objections and the LEA's comments on them must be sent to the Secretary of State, who decides all such proposals. All objections and comments on them are given serious consideration before any decision is taken. We see no need, therefore, to amend Circular 23/94 to cover this point.

School Meals

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the circumstances wherein it would be deemed unreasonable for a local education authority to provide a school lunch under the terms of Clause 103 (2) of the School Standards and Framework Bill. [21918]

Ms Estelle Morris: This will be for the local education authority to decide in the fist instance and will depend on the circumstances of each individual case. It could, for example, apply where a child did not turn up for their meal until the very end of the lunch break.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which local education authorities in England and Wales offer only a restricted paid meals service. [21917]

Ms Estelle Morris: I am aware that the local education authorities for Buckinghamshire, Bournemouth, Dorset, Gloucestershire, Hampshire, Harrow, Hereford and Worcester, Kingston upon Thames, Lincolnshire, Milton Keynes, Northamptonshire, Rutland and Somerset offer meals for sale in some but not all of their schools. Individual schools may make their own arrangements. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is responsible for education in Wales.

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment which local education authorities in England and Wales do not offer a paid meals service. [21916]

Ms Estelle Morris: I am not aware of any local education authorities in England that do not offer a paid meals service in any of their schools. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales is responsible for education in Wales.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will set out, for each local education authority, in the most recent three years for which the information is available, the budgeted and actual expenditure by the Funding Agency for Schools on annual maintenance grant for grant maintained schools. [22058]

Mr. Byers: The calculation of annual maintenance grant for individual grant maintained schools in England is a matter for the Funding Agency for Schools. I have therefore written to Sir Anthony Tippet, Chairman of the Funding Agency, to ask him to provide the figures requested.

Modern Apprenticeships

Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the future of funding for modern apprenticeships. [21957]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 9 December that we are making available an extra £10 million for Modern Apprenticeships next year, enough to fund 10,000 places more than previously planned.

Youth Unemployment (Voluntary Work)

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what opportunities will be available for young unemployed people to take up work in the voluntary sector as part of the New Deal. [20170]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The voluntary sector can offer young people work experience under the Employment, Voluntary Sector or Environment Task Force options of the New Deal for unemployed 18–24 year olds. The broad range of voluntary organisations involved in the New Deal will ensure a wide range of opportunities for young people to undertake work of value to their local communities.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Fair Trade (Coffee and Tea)

Mr. MacShane: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to the oral statement by the Secretary of State for International Development, Official Report, 5 November 1997, column 332, if he will instruct officials to serve coffee and tea furnished by suppliers who adhere to fair trade standards in her Department. [15500]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 13 November 1997, Official Report, column 617. All procurement decisions in the Department are based on the Government's policy of value for money.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps she is taking to minimise the effects of the millennium computer compliance problem on businesses. [18643]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 4 December 1997]: Private sector businesses are responsible for correcting their own millennium bug problems. However, the Government have been acting in concert with industry organisations to raise awareness of the problem and signpost solutions. On 29 September, the President of the Board of Trade announced a new initiative, Action 2000, to spur industry into tackling the problem. Action 2000 will focus on what businesses need to do to fix their systems. On 28 October I announced that Don Cruickshank would be Action 2000 Chairman. The Terms of Reference of Action 2000 were outlined in my reply to the hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) on 17 November 1997, Official Report, columns, 50–51.

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on progress in establishing Action 2000. [20803]

Mrs. Roche: Don Cruickshank, the Chairman of Action 2000, has appointed an acting Director to assist him and they are working actively with the Department, and with several other organisations to develop a range of activities to help businesses tackle the problem. Contracts have been placed with professional organisations to recruit full-time staff; to research industry's progress, developing a better understanding of what is inhibiting its progress; and to help devise a strategy for effectively communicating the messages and the help which will be available to businesses.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many staff are working on millennium computer compliance at her Department (a) for her Department's systems and (b) to educate business. [20917]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: (a) The resources devoted to the millennium compliance of the core Department's own system are subject to regular change as individual projects start and conclude. Currently, approximately 23 staff from private sector contractors and three in-house staff are engaged on such work.

(b) The number of staff involved in helping to establish the Department's Action 2000 initiative in partnership with industry to support UK businesses is four full time officials and one consultant.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what proportion of the public sector she estimates will be fully millennium computer compliant by 31 December 1999; and if she will make a statement; [21498]

(2) if she will make a single Minister responsible for ensuring public sector millennium computer compliance, across all public sector bodies; and if she will make a statement. [21499]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 18 December 1997]: The responsibility within Government for ensuring that the public sector takes action to avoid problems arising from the millennium date change rests with the Secretary of State concerned. The Group which I chair will bring together Ministers from the key departments to ensure that the action is properly co-ordinated.

Oil and Gas Employment

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is her estimate of jobs created by the development of United Kingdom Continental Shelf gas and oil resources (a) offshore and (b) in contracting and supply industries onshore. [19990]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 9 December 1997]: (a) The Inland Revenue estimates the number of people employed offshore to be around 26,850.

(b) There are no comprehensive official statistics for this industrial sector due to the difficulties in identifying the goods and services used in the development of oil and gas resources, but the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association has estimated that direct and indirect employment onshore could be some 300,000. In the early 1970s, UK suppliers and contractors' share of UKCS developments was estimated to be 25 to 30 per cent. In 1991, the last year for which data were collated the UK share was 78 per cent.

Armoured Vehicle Exports

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade pursuant to her answer of 18 July 1997, Official Report, column 370, on export licences and Gulf Transac, if she is now in a position to reply. [20034]

Mrs. Roche: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 19 December and have placed a copy of that letter in the Library of the House.

Parliamentary Answer

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when she expects to provide a substantive reply to the question of 24 July from the hon. Member for Cynon Valley on export licences issued to Alvis. [20035]

Mrs. Roche: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 19 December and have placed a copy of that letter in the Library of the House.

Export Initiatives

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate she has made of the additional cost to her Department of undertaking work previously administered by the Home Office Export Initiative; and from which budget it will be found. [20014]

Mrs. Roche: Overseas Trade Services provides advice and assistance to all British companies seeking to trade overseas. It is not possible to estimate the proportion allocated to companies in the security industries sector.

Toyota

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will raise objections in the Competition Directorate over French subsidies to Toyota. [20916]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The Commission (DGIV) will examine any aid package to determine whether it is compatible with the State aid rules of the Treaty of Rome and the terms of the Motor Vehicles Framework. They have the power to reduce or reject aid which is not compatible. Provided the aid is compatible with the Framework there will be no grounds to object.

Diamond Cable Communications (UK) Ltd.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations she has received concerning Diamond Cable Communications (UK) Ltd. [21860]

Mrs. Roche: The Department has received five letters from hon. Members concerning Diamond Cable during 1997. Three related to the Company's decision to introduce a charge for off-peak local calls to Internet Service Providers. Two were individual questions about the siting of street cabinets within the company's franchises.

Country Desks

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many country desks there are in her Department. [21858]

Mrs. Roche: All overseas countries and territories are covered by a DTI country desk. Full details of the structure can be found in the DTI Functional Directory, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Territorial Employment Pacts

Mr. Flight: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement on the Government's objectives for territorial employment pacts. [21851]

Mrs. Roche: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn, (Mr. Jones) on 16 July 1997, Official Report, column 229.

I look to the 10 territorial employment pacts being supported by the Commission to develop effective local partnerships which, by closer co-operation between the partners, will improve economic development and job creation in the areas concerned. Successful partnerships should provide a model for similar action in other areas.

Export Licences

Ann Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) pursuant to her answer of 24 July 1997, Official Report, column 330, if she will list the 59 applications for licences for the export of goods controlled under Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order, listing those licences which (a) have been granted, (b) have been refused and (c) are still pending and the categories of equipment or services that they cover; [20037]

(2) pursuant to her answer of 2 December 1997, Official Report, column 124, if she will list the (a) companies which have been licensed and (b) equipment involved, in the 22 licences which her Department has approved; how many applications for licences to export arms to Indonesia remain for decision; and when she expects decisions to be made. [20009]

Mrs. Roche: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) on 2 December 1997, Official Report, columns 124–26. The provision of services to Indonesia is not controlled.

As regards the disclosure of the identity of the licensees and details of the goods concerned, inquiries are being made under the non-statutory Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. Since confidential information is involved, the consent of the licensees is being sought for its disclosure. I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible and place a copy of that letter in the Library of the House. At 13 November 1997, 65 applications to export to Indonesia goods controlled under Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order (the so-called "Military List") were awaiting a decision: 25 applications for a standard individual export licence and 40 for an Open Individual Export Licence. The entry in the legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as the goods' rating.

[1] OIELs often cover a range of countries as well as a range of goods, controlled under several entries in the legislation. Where this is so the OIEL is included in the table in the total shown against each of the relevant countries and ratings.

However, this information should be considered in light of my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), on 30 October 1997, Official Report columns 870–71.

As stated in the Export Control Organisation's Code of Practice, when applicants have submitted all of the necessary documentation, the aim is to give a substantive response within 20 working days when other Government Departments have to be consulted and 10 working days when such consultation is not necessary.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list the arms for which licences for export to (a) Turkey, (b) India, (c) Pakistan, (d) Algeria, (e) Angola, (f) Nigeria, (g) Syria, (h) Egypt, (i) Kenya, (j) Ethiopia and (k) Eritrea have been granted since 1 May. [20994]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 18 December 1997]: The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated and the results are as follows: between 2 May and 21 November, eight Open Individual Export Licences (OIELs) were issued to export goods controlled under entries in Part III of Schedule I to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994 (the so-called "Military List") to one or more of the specified countries. The entry in the legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating.

[1] OIELs often cover a range of countries as well as a range of goods, controlled under several entries in the legislation. Where this is so the OIEL is included in the table in the total shown against each of the relevant countries and ratings. In addition, one Open Individual Export Licence was issued for the export to any destination of certain goods for use by specified persons working in the media.

However, this information should be considered in light of the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint) on 30 October 1997, Official Report, columns 870–71.

I will write to the hon. and learned Member as soon as possible with respect to the information requested about standard individual export licences and place a copy of that letter in the library.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list the arms for which licences for export to (a) Turkey, (b) India, (c) Pakistan, (d) Algeria, (e) Angola, (f), Nigeria, (g) Syria, (h) Egypt, (i) Kenya, (j) Ethiopia and (k) Eritrea have been denied since 1 May, indicating the grounds for refusal in each case. [20995]

Mrs. Roche [holding answer 18 December 1997]: The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated and the results are as follows.

Between 2 May and 21 November, five applications were refused for standard individual licences to export goods controlled under entries in Part III of Schedule I to the Export of Goods (control) Order 1994 (the so-called "Military List") to one or more of the specified countries. The entry in the legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating.

No Application for open individual licences to export such goods to these countries were refused in the period.

However, this information should be considered in the light of the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley, (Caroline Flint) on 30 October 1997, Official Report, columns 870–71.

The decision to refuse the applications listed above were made after careful consideration of each case against the criteria announced to the House by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on 28 July 1997, Official Report, columns 26–29.

Professional Qualifications

Mr. Syms: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans she has to extend recognition under the Communities (Recognition of Professional Qualifications) Regulations 1991 to organisations without a Royal Charter. [21885]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Regulations fulfil the UK's commitment under the Treaty of Rome to implement Directive 89/48/EEC which facilitates free movement through the mutual recognition of qualifications awarded in respect of regulation professions. They list those professions regulated by law or public authority in the UK, which include titles awarded by professional bodies incorporated by Royal Charter.

There are no plans to extend the Regulations to bodies which do not hold a Royal Charter.

Sellafield

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what date Euratom Safeguards Inspectors made their first visit to Sellafield. [22138]

Mrs. Roche: Eurotom Safeguards Inspectors made their first visit to Sellafield on 4 December 1973.

Small and Medium Enterprises

Mr. Dismore: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will make a statement of progress on the implementation of the EU SME Initiative for England. [22247]

Mrs. Roche: I am pleased to announce that the Initiative was ratified by the Commission on 12 December 1997. This is welcome news for SMEs in the Objective 1, 2 and 5(b) areas of England, who will benefit from some £34 million of European structural funds. The Initiative, which will help SMEs access new international markets and improve their competitiveness, will run until the end of 1999.

Magnox Electric (Merger)

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made on the plans to merge Magnox Electric with British Nuclear Fuels; and if she will make a statement. [22363]

Mr. Battle: I am pleased to report that, subject to Parliamentary clearance of certain proposed financial arrangements, we expect to effect the first stage of the merger—namely the transfer of the Government's shareholding in Magnox Electric to BNFL—early in the New Year. Full integration of the combined businesses of the two companies is expected to be completed about 12 months after the share transfer, subject to the companies meeting the requirements of the relevant regulators.

Safety will continue to be the companies' overriding concern. The merger will not change that.

Before full integration can take place, BNFL will need to have obtained new nuclear site licences, new radioactive discharge authorisations and a revised electricity generation licence to replace those currently held by Magnox Electric. The independent nuclear safety, environmental and electricity regulating authorities have been consulted about the proposed integration arrangements and have indicated that they are prepared to consider applications on the basis of those arrangements.

The merger will create an enlarged, integrated and strong BNFL able, for the first time, to manage all aspects of the magnox business as a whole.

Under existing arrangements, a substantial part of Magnox Electric's costs relate to fuel, reprocessing and waste management services provided by BNFL. A principal aim of the merger is to bring together the financial and management responsibilities for these processes to create better incentives for securing cost reductions.

Bringing together magnox generation and the supporting fuel cycle services under one management will also mean the business can be managed as a whole and with greater efficiency. The merger should therefore accelerate the cost reduction and business improvement programmes which each of the companies has been separately pursuing. It will remove the barriers which exist between Magnox as customer and BNFL as supplier bringing greater transparency to the underlying economics of the business and providing opportunities to combine the technical and commercial skills which currently exist within the two companies.

I have taken steps, and know that many people are concerned, to ensure that the full costs of the companies' nuclear liabilities will be met. I am pleased to announce that the combined group will establish an internal dedicated Liabilities Fund consisting of cash and realisable assets which will ensure that the full costs of all future liabilities of Magnox and BNFL can be met as they fall due. I am sure that this development coupled with the greater transparency that this will entail will be widely welcomed.

In examining how to effect the merger, a great deal of attention was paid to the financial arrangements. When the nuclear generating industry was re-organised at the end of March 1996, Magnox Electric received an undertaking in exchange for, and equivalent in value to, the net book value of assets transferred out of the company and the liabilities it took on from Scottish Nuclear. The undertaking provides for the Government to make payments to enable Magnox to meet its future financial obligations. The principal value of that undertaking at March 1996 was £3.7 billion. That value is increased annually by 4.5 per cent in real terms and is projected to have a value of £4.3 billion in March 1998. We have carried out with Magnox Electric and BNFL a thorough review of the arrangements to apply to the combined organisation. In particular, we needed to get an up to date assessment of the forecast cost of discharging liabilities and then determine what level of Government undertaking would be appropriate to the combined organisation. The conclusion is that the principal sum of a new undertaking (to replace the existing undertaking to Magnox Electric) should be set at £3.7 billion as at 31 March 1998, but that it would be appropriate to apply the same escalation terms as in the existing undertaking to Magnox Electric. This represents an immediate reduction of some £600 million in the Government's current liability.

The new arrangements will also bring to an end assurances given by the Government in 1990 and reaffirmed each year since then which give Magnox Electric added comfort that the Government will, if necessary, help them to meet the costs of their long term nuclear liabilities. Magnox Electric has successfully reduced the large deficit for nuclear liabilities in its balance sheet and projects that without the benefits of integration the gap would have reduced to £0.5 billion by the end of the current financial year. Taking into account the benefits which are expected to flow from the merger with BNFL, all three parties have agreed that there is no need for the Government assurances to continue beyond share transfer.

Given the length of time which these arrangements are to cover, there is provision for the value of the proposed new undertaking to be subject to limited review every five years or earlier if Government and BNFL agree.

We expect the combined group to reduce substantially the costs of discharging magnox liabilities through efficiency savings. In recognition of this, a formal mechanism will be put in place under which Government and the combined business will share the benefit of the first £1.6 billion (at 31 March 1998 prices) of reductions in the company's magnox-related nuclear provisions. This will allow the undertaking to be adjusted downwards by up to £0.8 billion (at the same base price). The majority of these benefits are expected to accrue within the first ten years after the merger.

In summary, the merger will result in a robust and viable group, better placed and better incentivised to manage the magnox business as a whole and to secure savings for the taxpayer. At the same time it will bring the establishment of a dedicated, internal fund to meet the companies' nuclear liabilities; there will be an immediate reduction of some £1.1 billion in the Government's current liability, and incentives will be introduced for the combined business to make further substantial savings which the Government will share. The merger has the full support of the Boards of both Magnox and BNFL.

My Department is today laying before this House a Departmental Minute about the new financial undertaking which is proposed to be given to the integrated group. A copy of that Minute together with a Briefing Note, which provides more detailed information on the proposed integration of the two companies, is being placed in the libraries of both Houses.

Johnson & Johnson

Mr. Swayne: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations she has received on the provision of EU assistance to Johnson & Johnson for its move from New Milton to the Republic of Ireland. [22265]

Mrs. Roche: I am not aware of any such representations about EU assistance.

Citizens First Campaign

Mrs. May: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action her Department is taking to promote the second phase of the Citizens First campaign launched by the European Commission on 25 November. [22199]

Mrs. Roche: My colleague the Minister for Trade and Competitiveness in Europe is hosting, with the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, a press conference on 20 January to promote the second phase of the campaign in this country. We shall also be helping the Commission to distribute Citizens First literature.

Correspondence

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many letters the Minister for Competition and Consumer Affairs has sent to hon. Members since his appointment; how many of the letters he signed personally; and how many of the letters were sent with a facsimile of his signature. [22186]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: I have sent a great many letters to hon. Members, but since ensuring a speedy, accurate and helpful response is my priority, neither I nor my staff have time to collect the information in the form requested.

Mr. Chope: To ask the President of the Board of Trade for what reasons the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry did not include a salutation and a signature on her letter of 11 December to the hon. Member for Christchurch in response to his to the Secretary of State on 13 November concerning Mr. John Reid. [22068]

Mrs. Roche: This occurred due to a clerical oversight. A revised letter (concerning Mr. M. Reid of John Reid & Sons) has been sent to the hon. Member.

Multilateral Agreement on Investment

Mr. David Heath: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the Government will seek an amendment to the Multilateral Agreement on Investment to include the right of people adversely affected by multinational action abroad to take legal action against the multinational in their home country. [21929]

Mrs. Roche: No. This is a matter of domestic law in the country concerned and of international legal co-operation.

Offshore Installations

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what support her Department has given to the development and commercialisation of the technology described as FPSO over the last 10 years. [12695]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 27 October 1997]: We have assumed that the hon. Member when he uses the abbreviation FPSO is referring to the marine installations used in the oil and gas industry called Floating Production, Storage and Offloading facilities. FPSOs are large ships which are built for the purpose or are converted from oil tankers. Typically these ships displace over 100,000 tonnes.

1995 saw the publication of an authoritative report by a Working Group established by DTI with strong representation from UK industry. The Working Group sought to address the problem of the lack of competitive capability within the UK to supply FPSOs and to identify measures which could help to improve competitiveness. Since the publication of that report the UK has built up a strong capability in the building, conversion and equipping of FPSOs. The main centres of activity are Newcastle, Belfast, Glasgow and Inverness.

My Department, through the Research and Development Programme operated by the Infrastructure and Energy Projects Directorate, has provided £604,868 towards the costs of projects related to FPSO construction and operation over the last 10 years.

Laser Pens

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what guidelines her Department has produced on the level of proof that will be required for the purchase of laser pens with beams more powerful then one milliwatt. [15920]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Laser pens with beams of more than one milliwatt are classified as class 3 A, 3 B and 4 in the BS EN 60825–Part 1: 1994 and in my statement of 28 October, I made clear the department's view that such pens present an unacceptable risk when used by the general public.

Under the General Product Safety Regulations such products may only be supplied if they are exclusively used in the context of a commercial activity and are not supplied to a consumer.

Suppliers who fail to comply with the Regulations face penalties of a maximum fine of £5,000 and/or a maximum term of three months in prison.

For further guidance on levels of proofs retailers may be advised to seek legal advice.

Sale of Goods

Mr. Luff: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if it is her policy to ban products from retail sale if they pose a significant health risk to the general public; and if she will make a statement. [20118]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Yes, where that is the most appropriate way to reduce such risks. The action take to ban dangerous fireworks is an example of how law can be applied.

Taskforce 2000

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list the members of the Action 2000 group; if she will make a statement on its remit; and to what extent its work supercedes that of Taskforce 2000. [20373]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 11 December 1997]: I have appointed Don Cruickshank to be Chairman of Action 2000 and he is consulting a range of organisations about the membership of the Advisory Board, as required by the terms of his appointment. His selection of members will then be made in consultation with me and taking due account of the Code of Practice published by the Commissioner on Public Appointments.

On the question of Action 2000's remit, I refer the hon. Member to the answers given to the hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) on 17 November 1997, Official Report, columns 50–51 and on 19 November 1997, Official Report, columns 190–91.

The Department's funding of Taskforce 2000 will cease on 31 March 1998 or when the £350,000 to which we are committed has been spent, whichever is the sooner. The emphasis needs to shift from telling businesses that a problem exists to ensuring that they take appropriate action, and I established Action 2000 to look at all aspects of the problem.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representatives she has received in respect of the work of Taskforce 2000; and if she will place copies of all representations in the Library. [20374]

Mrs. Beckett: The Government have discussed the work of Taskforce 2000 with several organisations, including the CBI, the Federation of the Electronics Industry, the Computing Services and Software Association, the National Computing Centre, and Action 2000. We have also received unsolicited letters from companies and private individuals. Unsolicited representations are treated in confidence by the Department.

Minimum Wage

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will list the forecasts relating to the employment consequences arising from the implementation of a minimum wage contained in representations evaluated by her Department. [20911]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: It is for the Low Pay Commission to evaluate representations about the National Minimum Wage, including any containing forecasts of employment consequences.

Power Stations

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate she has made of the relative costs of generating power (a) from coal in an old power station running at base load and (b) a new gas power station operating at peak times. [20895]

Mrs. Beckett [holding answer 15 December 1997]: The Department does not produce figures regarding individual types of plant as the costs from these vary widely depending on the plant design and fuel costs. However in its report on the proposed merger between PowerGen plc and Midlands Electricity plc in April 1996, the MMC estimated the relative capital, operating and fuel costs of coal fired and open cycle gas fired plant. From these figures one can conclude that old coal fired plant operating at a 90 per cent. load factor would generate electricity at a cost of £15 per megawatt hour while new peak lopping Open Cycle Gas Fired Plant operating at a 10 per cent. load factor would generate electricity at a cost of £69 per megawatt hour.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when her Department will decide its future policy on new gas-fired power stations. [21769]

Mrs. Beckett: This must await the outcome of the Review announced on Wednesday 3 December. A timetable will be announced shortly.

Mr. Andy King: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if she will announce the terms of reference for the review on the approval of new power stations which was announced by the Prime Minister on 3 December. [22263]

Mrs. Beckett: The Prime Minister announced in the House on 10 December 1997, Official Report, columns 1002–03 that the Government would review the long-term energy requirements of the nation and make sure that we had an energy policy consistent with a competitive industry and the long-term energy needs of the country. As part of this, a review is being undertaken into energy sources for power generation as announced on 3 December, and its terms of reference are as follows:

The Review will look at medium and longer-term scenarios for the development of generating capacity and sources of fuel supply for generation, and consider the implications of high levels of dependence on any particular fuel, source of supply, transport route, or technology.

It will take as its starting point trends in energy sources for power generation, especially the growing dependence on gas, taking into account the energy policy objective of secure, diverse and sustainable supplies of energy at competitive prices and, in particular, the role of coal. Account will also be taken of the objective of sustainable development (including the meeting of environmental targets), and of European and other international obligations.

The Review will also consider technical factors related to the growing use of gas in generation, including:

the provision of system stability, frequency control, flexibility of response to demand of or supply variations, and ancillary security services;

the possibilities for, and likelihood of, interruption of gas supplies, the impact of such interruptions, and possible measures, such as the holding of fuel stocks, to mitigate the risks and consequences of interruption;

in respect of generators connected to regional distribution systems rather than directly to the Grid, the circumstances, if any, in which they may have an impact on the ability of the Grid operator to manage the balance of supply and demand both nationally and locally, and the significance of such impacts; any geographical and locational factors; the implications of the siting of power stations for energy security and systems stability.

While a number of the issues covered in the Review relate principally to England and Wales, the Scottish aspects will also be covered.

The Review will make recommendations to Ministers, in the light of the above considerations, as to:

(a) the energy policy considerations relevant to applications for consent under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989 and in considering notifications under section 14 of the Energy Act 1976; and

(b) any consequences of these considerations for guidance to local authorities as respects planning applications for generating plan not subject to section 36.

Interested parties are invited to submit their representations in writing by Monday 16 February 1998. The Department reserves the right to disclose or publish any representation unless it is clearly marked "in confidence".

In addition, the following arrangements will apply during the period of the Review as respects electricity generation in Great Britain:

Applications under section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989

While the Review is under way, the Secretary of State proposes to defer decisions on outstanding or new applications under section 36.

Notifications under section 14 of the Energy Act 1976

The Energy Act 1976 applies separate controls on the establishment of or conversion to an oil or gas-fired electricity generating station (section 14(1)), and on the making or extending or arrangements for the supply of gas to such a station (section 14(2)). During the period of the Review, the Secretary of State proposes to defer consideration of the following:

(a) notifications relating to natural gas or oil fired generating stations or natural gas supply arrangements, where the decision on the related section 36 application is deferred or the application has not been made;

(b) notifications relating to natural gas or oil fired generating stations where the station is between 10MW and 50MW capacity (stations below 10MW are exempt under an Order); and

(c) notifications relating to natural gas supply arrangements where consideration of the section 14(1) notification in respect of the natural gas fired generating station in question is deferred under (b), and, subject to the above and any special circumstances (for example as respects the interval that has elapsed), proposes to continue to consider:

(i) notifications relating to natural gas or oil fired generating stations or natural gas supply arrangements where the section 36 consent for the station in question has been issued; and

(ii) where section 36 does not apply, notifications relating to natural gas supply arrangements where the Secretary of State has indicated that he or she does not object to the section 14(1) notification in respect of the natural gas fired generating station in question.

Applications under section 37 of the Electricity Act 1989

These applications, which relate to overhead electric lines, will generally continue to be processed during the period of the Review. However, where the application relates solely to a deferred power generation project, it is proposed to defer work such as public inquiries or related wayleave hearings where there might be a risk of incurring nugatory expenditure.

Requests for exceptions

The Secretary of State will be prepared to consider, on their merits, reasoned requests for exceptions to be made in particular cases. In this context, the Secretary of State would be mindful of the environmental and other benefits of combined heat and power.

Power generation below 10MW

Subject to powers of secondary legislation, neither section 36 of the Electricity Act 1989, nor section 14 of the Energy Act 1976 currently apply to such cases. These cases will accordingly be able to proceed as before during the period of the Review.

Ministerial Expenses

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much has been spent on refurbishing and refurnishing (a) ministerial offices in her Department and (b) her official President's apartment. [21765]

Mrs. Beckett: The amounts spent are as follows:

(a) £8,698

(b) £64,314

Electricity and Coal Industries

Mr. Redwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if a Minister of her Department was present at the meetings held by the Paymaster General with the electricity and coal industries on 15 December. [21768]

Mrs. Beckett: DTI was represented at official level.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade, pursuant to her answer of 16 December 1997, Official Report, columns 120–22, on secondees from the private sector, what has been the cost to public funds of the 113 placements. [21857]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Over a 12 month period, the Department will have reimbursed the employers of the 113 secondees approximately £2.55 million towards their employment costs.

British Coal

Mr. Illsley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what restrictions are placed upon British Coal by the Government to ensure that compensation claims are settled within a set budget; [22188]

(2) what budgetary constraints are placed upon British Coal to settle multiple compensation claims within a set of financial limits. [22187]

Mr. Battle: Under the standard arrangements for nationalised industries, British Coal's financial budget is governed by the External Financing Limit (EFL) notified by the Department to Parliament. The EFL is then closely monitored by the Department to ensure that total expenditure is properly managed by the Corporation.

Expenditure associated with any compensation awards that have been fully established, either by a Court or by an admission of liability by British Coal, are expected to be accommodated within the EFL for any one year in question. Any change to the EFL is based upon consideration of the total financing requirements of the Corporation, rather than on a particular category of expenditure.

It is intended that responsibility for British Coal health liabilities will transfer to the Department at the end of 1997.

Concessionary Fuel Agreement

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the cost of the Mineworkers' Concessionary Fuel Scheme for (a) 1995–96 and (b) 1996–97 and what is the projected cost for 1997–98; what is the projected cost of the scheme for the first year of operation based on the new arrangements; how many beneficiaries will be detrimentally affected by the new arrangements; and what is the projected saving to public funds of the new arrangements. [22275]

Mr. Battle: The cost of providing concessionary fuel and cash in lieu of fuel to all ex-employees of British Coal and their dependants, for which liability transferred to the Secretary of State on March 1995, was £85 million in 1995–96, and £87 million in 1996–97. The projected cost in 1997–98 is £85 million. These figures are affected by variations in the applicable rate of VAT, differential rates in the switching from fuel to cash in lieu from year to year, and the severity of the winters which affected the uptake of fuel. The cost in 1998–99 is expected to be in the range £73–77 million depending on the extent of further switching away from fuel to cash in lieu, and allowing for the lower rate of VAT on fuel. The saving in public funds from the new arrangements derives from the competitive prices secured on a range of smokeless fuel.

Beneficiaries who receive coal are unaffected by the new arrangements. Any adjustments in respect of anthracite are likely to be marginal. The entitlements of certain manufactured smokeless fuels will be reduced as a result of re-balancing but other entitlements will increase, and in virtually all cases where entitlements are reduced beneficiaries will have the option of switching to an alternative fuel which carries a higher entitlement. Thus, the vast majority of beneficiaries need be no worse off in terms of the quantity of fuel available to them, and many could be better off.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the coal mining trade unions were informed of the proposed new arrangements to the Concessionary Fuel Agreement; and when the consultation period will end. [22233]

Mr. Battle: My Department wrote to the mining unions on 17 December explaining the new arrangements for concessionary fuel from March 1998, and proposed a meeting in the early New Year.

FirstBus, Glasgow

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when she expects to announce his decision on the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report relating to the FirstBus operations in Glasgow; and if she will make a statement. [22120]

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: My right hon. Friend is considering the Director General of Fair Trading's advice on FirstBus's request for a review of the decision of the then Minister for Corporate and Consumer Affairs following the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on FirstBus's acquisition of S. B. Holdings. She will announce her decision on FirstBus's request as quickly as is practicable.

HEALTH

Overseas Travel

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his estimate of the expenditure by (a) his Department, (b) its agencies and (c) its non-departmental public bodies on overseas travel for (i) 1980–81, (ii) 1987–88, (iii) 1990–91, (iv) 1991–92, (v) 1992—93, (vi) 1993—94, (vii) 1994–95, (viii) 1995–96, (ix) 1996–97 and (x) 1 May to 30 September 1997; and if he will provide a breakdown to show (1) air fares and (2) other expenditure relating to overseas travel. [15219]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 11 November 1997]: Details of the expenditure of the Department of Health, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies on overseas travel for the years 1993–94 to 1996–97 are shown in the table.

The Department changed its accounting software in 1992–93 and detailed figures are not available for earlier years. The Department formed part of the Department of Health and Social Security until July 1988.

Community Health Nurses (South-West)

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of community health nurses in each health authority in (a) Cornwall and (b) Devon in each year since 1979 for which figures are available. [15657]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 12 November 1997]: The information requested is available from 1982 and is shown in the table.

Notes:

1. Figures are not available before 1982 and for individual health authorities from 1982 to 1986.
2. Figures for 1982 to 1989 are for "primary healthcare" nursing and midwifery staff, including: health visitors, district nurses, school nurses, community midwives and a small number of other "primary healthcare" nursing and midwifery staff. The figures for 1990 to 1994 cover the same staff groups as for 1982 to 1989, but include community psychiatric nurses and community learning difficulties nurses, and exclude community midwives. The figures for 1995 to 1996 are based on new occupation codes and are not, therefore, directly comparable with figures for earlier years although they cover similar groups to those used in 1990 to 1994.

Figures are rounded to the nearest ten.

Tobacco Advertising

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in respect of the Draft EU Directive on Tobacco Advertising if a regulatory appraisal was prepared, pursuant to the Cabinet Office Guidelines, "Regulation in the Balance"; if a risk assessment and a compliance cost assessment were prepared in respect of the same directive and, pursuant to the same guidelines; which Minister read and signed the appraisal and assessments, pursuant to the guidelines; if he will publish the regulatory appraisal compliance cost assessment and risk assessment in respect of the directive; and if all requirements of the guidelines were fulfilled in respect of this directive. [20883]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 15 December 1997]: I refer the hon. Member to my letter of 19 December 1997 to the Chairman of the Select Committee on European Legislation, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to give a substantive reply to the question tabled by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon on 10 December on tobacco advertising, to which a holding reply was given on 15 December; and for what reasons a holding reply was given. [21908]

Ms Jowell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave today. A holding reply was given because at the time the question was asked the matter at issue was the subject of a letter from the Chairman of the Select Committee on European Legislation to me. A reply to that letter has now been given and sets out the Government's position in full. Copies have been placed in the Library.

Chiropody Services

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the cost to the NHS in terms of emergency admissions and other NHS treatment as a result of reductions in expenditure on chiropody services. [17801]

Mr. Boateng: None. We have not received any evidence that emergency admissions or any other National Health Service treatment has increased as a result of changes in service provision.

Pathology Services

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department received the 1995 report Review of Pathology Services at Kent and Canterbury Hospitals NHS Trust; and what action was taken. [17798]

Mr. Boateng: The 1995 report Review of Pathology Services at Kent and Canterbury Hospitals National Health Service Trust was an internal document commissioned by the Trust to enable it to develop its formal strategy in relation to Pathology services. Therefore, a copy of the report was not sent by the trust to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) from which providers of pathology services, and in what proportion, were (i) histopathology/cytology, (ii) microbiology, (iii) biochemistry and (iv) haematology test procured by the Thanet Healthcare Trust or its predecessor in each year since 1985; [17814]

(2) what proportion of (i) histopathology/cytology, (ii) microbiology, (iii) biochemistry and (iv) haematology tests were carried out by the Kent and Canterbury NHS Trust Pathology Service in each year since 1985 as a result of referrals from the private sector; and what proportion were from the National Health Services; [17795]

(3) what proportion of histopathology/cytology tests were carried out by the Kent and Canterbury NHS Trust Pathology Service in each year since 1985 as a result of referrals from the private sector; and what proportion were from the National Health Service; [17794]

(4) from which providers of pathology services, and in what proportion, were (i) histopathology/cytology, (ii) microbiology, (iii) biochemistry and (iv) haematology tests procured by the Kent and Canterbury NHS Trust or its predecessor in each year since 1985; [17792]

(5) from which providers of pathology services, and in what proportion, were (i) histopathology/cytology, (ii) microbiology, (iii) biochemistry and (iv) haematology tests procured by general practitioners in the East Kent Authority Area in each year since 1985; [17793]

(6) from which providers of pathology services, and in what proportion, were (i) histopathology/cytology, (ii) microbiology, (iii) biochemistry and (iv) haematology tests procured by the Chaucer Clinic in each year from its opening; [17815]

(7) from which providers of pathology services, and in what proportion, were (i) histopathology/cytology, (ii) microbiology, (iii) biochemistry and (iv) haematology tests procured by the William Harvey Hospital, Ashford in each year since 1985. [17791]

Mr. Boateng: The information is not collected centrally in the form requested. The data available centrally are contained in "Diagnostic Departments". The information was collected on the Department of Health form, KH11, "Diagnostic Departments, pathology", by regional health authority areas. The data are no longer collected. The last year of collection was 1993–94.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list each meeting by each Minister since 1 May with individuals employed by NHS trusts and health authorities in London. [17594]

Mr. Milburn: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 26 November 1997, Official Report, columns 597–98.

GP Fundholding (North Essex)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money was spent by GP fundholders in the North Essex Health Authority area on administrative costs of operating the internal market in the last year for which figures are available. [18612]

Mr. Milburn: Fundholding general practitioners are allocated as part of their allotted sum a management allowance to meet the costs of managing their fund. This covers the employment of staff and other costs associated with the management of their fundholding budget, as well as the reimbursement of GP fundholding computing costs.

For 1997–98, a total of £2,604,000 has been allocated to North Essex Health Authority for the management costs of fundholders in their area.

Any management allowance under spent can be transferred to patient care.

Dental Services

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimates he has made of the proportion of dental patients who request a second professional opinion before allowing treatment to go ahead. [18726]

Mr. Milburn: Patients who may seek the professional opinion of a second dentist wold not be recorded. The Dental Reference Service of the Dental Practice Board for England and Wales undertook 724 examinations of National Health Service dental patients at the request of the dentist or the patient in the year to 1 December 1997.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of alleged dental malpractice and incompetence were notified to him by community health councils for the last year for which figures are available. [18727]

Mr. Milburn: Responsibility for investigating such allegations lies with the General Dental Council which has statutory functions under the Dentists Act 1984 in relation to both the professional conduct and the fitness to practise of dentists in the United Kingdom. The Council has a statutory remit to promote high standards of professional conduct among dentists.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many dental practitioners were in practice in the Greater London area at the latest available date. [19556]

Mr. Milburn: In the Greater London area there were 2,932 General Dental Service dentists on health authority lists at 30 September 1997. This figure includes principal dentists, assistants and vocational trainees. It does not include salaried, hospital or community dentists or dentists working solely in private practice.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people he estimates will be de-registered from NHS dental practices in the UK during 1998, as a result of the reduction in registration period from 24 to 15 months. [20997]

Mr. Milburn: From 1 September 1996, the registration period for both adult continuing care and child capitation was harmonised to provide patients with a period of continuing dental care for 15 months following each course of treatment. The most recent estimate is that registration numbers may gradually fall by about 4 million as a result of this change. However, the actual effect on the number of patients registered with a dentist will depend on the response to the incentive for many patients to attend the dentist on a more regular basis.

We estimate, on the same basis, that United Kingdom registration numbers may gradually fall by 4.5 million as a result of the change in registration period.

Regular attenders will be unaffected by the change as their registration period will roll forward when they attend their dentist.

Dentists are free to re-register any patients whose registrations have lapsed. It is for dentists to decide whether they wish to accept any patients onto their list.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the number of patients who will be de-registered from their dentists, as a result of the new regulations relating to the de-registering of patients who have not visited their dentist within the last 15 months (a) in total and (b) in Cornwall, in (i) numerical and (ii) percentage terms. [21323]

Mr. Milburn: From 1 September 1996, the registration period for both adult continuing care and child capitation payments was harmonised to provide patients with a period of continuing care for 15 months following each course of treatment. The most recent estimate is that registration numbers may gradually fall by 4 million as a result of this change.

This would represent about 15 per cent. of the total number of patients registered at 31 October 1997 (26.8 million) in England. No estimates for individual health authorities have been made.

Regular attenders will be unaffected by the change as their registration period will roll forward when they attend their dentist.

Dentists are free to re-register any patients whose registrations have lapsed. It is for dentists to decide whether they wish to accept any patient onto their list.

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will require NHS dentists to display prominently in their surgeries a list of (a) services and prices for treatment available on the NHS and (b) services available on the NHS dependent on the clinical advice of the dentist. [21640]

Mr. Milburn: Dentists are already required under their terms of service to display in a prominent position such information about charges for general dental services as the health authority for their area may approve, in accordance with any directions given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The information required includes how to get details of entitlement to, exemption from and remission of charges. Dentists are also required to compile and make available, to any person who reasonably requires one, a document about the provision of general dental services at their practice premises.

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the implications of the NHS White Paper on NHS dentistry. [21639]

Mr. Milburn: The White Paper sets out how the Government intend to build a modern and dependable National Health Service for the future. Health authorities will work with NHS trusts and Primary Care Groups to develop a Health Improvement Programme for their area. Dentists will be drawn into that process to contribute as appropriate to the planning and provision of services. Dentists also have their own separate and distinct contributions to make to the NHS and the Government will continue its dialogue with them about how they can best develop it.

Mrs. Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the percentage of (a) the adult and (b) the child population registered with an NHS dentist, by health authority. [21900]

Mr. Milburn: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his Department's latest estimate of the number, and proportion, of people registered with a dentist in Coventry. [21903]

Mr. Milburn: On 31 October 1997, 125,451 adults and 45,005 children were registered with a General Dental Service dentist practising from premises in the Coventry Health Authority area. These figures represent 36 per cent. and 70 per cent. respectively of the adult and child populations of Coventry at 30 June 1996.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures his Department is taking to ensure that the nation's oral health is maintained. [21902]

Mr. Milburn: The Government are committed to National Health Service dentistry and have stated our intention to see it improved further. We intend to reduce inequalities in oral health status and to improve access to NHS services.

In September, we announced a £9 million new initiative Investing in Dentistry. This will help to improve the availability of General Dental Services and extend the benefits of good oral health by focusing help on those areas of the country where problems are most acute, enabling dentists to expand existing practices and set up new ones.

We are going ahead with the piloting of Personal Dental Services. This will encourage partnerships between health authorities and dentists to develop more flexible ways of providing primary oral health care to attune it better to local needs. An announcement on the expressions of interest we have received will be made shortly, but we are encouraged by the number and quality of the proposals that have been received.

Additionally, changes to the registration periods for both adult continuing care and child capitation patients will improve value for money by focusing payments to dentists on those patients receiving active care from them. Any savings generated will be put back into the General Dental Service, in a targeted way to achieve better oral health for the population.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health at what time and on what date the Chief Medical Officer advised the Minister of Agriculture about his opinion on the latest SEAC finding. [20781]

Ms Jowell: The Chief Medical Officer has consistently taken the view that any tissues which have been shown to transmit bovine spongiform encephalopathy should be kept out of the human food chain. He confirmed these views in respect of dorsal root ganglia directly the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee advice was received on the morning of 3 December 1997.

Travel Vaccines

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his policy on the provision of travel vaccines from the National Health Service. [20999]

Ms Jowell: Advice on appropriate measures to protect health when travelling aborad, including advice on immunisation and malaria prophylaxis, is available under the National Health Service. Currently some vaccines against infectious disease are provided free for travellers as a matter of public health policy, others are not. Broadly speaking, those vaccines provided free offer protection against diseases which might be spread on return to the United Kingdom. Immunisation in these cases benefits not only the recipient but also the community at large, since each individual immunisation contributes to the general control of disease. We recognise that inconsistencies and ambiguities have arisen over the years in the arrangements for travel vaccines and the way they are interpreted. We are seeking to resolve these anomalies as part of an ongoing internal review.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in the UK received vaccination for travel aborad on the National Health Service in each of the last five years; and what was the cost to public funds. [21000]

Ms Jowell: It is not possible to say how many people were immunised for the purpose of travel abroad each year. Records are not kept of the number of people immunised and data on prescription items dispensed do not differentiate between primary courses (usually consisting of several doses of vaccine) and booster doses. The number of prescription items dispensed in England and the net ingredient costs for vaccines which may be given for the purposes of travel are given in the table. The data include some of the vaccines which will have been prescribed for reasons other than travel. The costs do not include dispensing costs. It is not possible to separately identify the cost of vaccinating patients in general practice.

The number of prescription items dispensed and net ingredient cost for vaccines administered for travel[1]: 1992–96 England

Year	Total number of prescription items (millions)	Total cost (£ million)
1992	3.2	16.5
1993	3.3	29.1
1994	3.4	40.5
1995	3.3	47.0
1996	3.3	49.1

[1] The travel vaccines are those preparations in the British National Formulary (BNF) [issue 30, September 1995] section 14.6—International travel: BCG, cholera, diphtheria, hepatitis A, meningococcal A&C, normal immunoglobulin, poliomyelitis, typhoid, typhoid-paratyphoid A&B and yellow fever. Some of these vaccines will have been prescribed for reasons other than travel.

Notes:

1. The data cover all prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, dispensing doctors, and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors for items personally administered in England.
2. The net ingredient cost refers to the cost of the drug before discounts and does not include any dispensing costs or fees.

Nurses

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many vacancies for nurses there are in hospitals within the Greater London area. [21382]

Mr. Milburn: Figures on vacancies for Hospitals and Community Health Services nurses and midwives are collected by the Office of Manpower and Economics and published in the annual reports of the Review Body for Nursing staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine; copies are available in the Library.

Long-term Care

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) men and (b) women were in National Health Service long-term care in England and Wales on 1 December. [21384]

Mr. Boateng: The information is not collected in the form requested. The available information is as follows: in England, in the first six months of 1997–98, health authorities reported 10,900 patients newly meeting eligibility criteria for continuing in-patient care. In the same period, health authorities also reported an average of 16,450 beds occupied each day by patients meeting eligibility criteria for continuing in-patient care (i.e. a total of just of 3 million bed days).

Questions relating to Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Northwick Park Hospital, Kenton

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he next plans to visit Northwick Park hospital, Kenton. [21861]

Mr. Milburn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health has no plans to visit Northwick Park Hospital in the near future.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many elderly patients are currently in Northwick Park hospital, Kenton. [21863]

Mr. Milburn: According to information from Harrow and Hillingdon National Health Service Trust, patients currently occupy 101 general beds for the elderly and 15 beds for the elderly mentally ill on the Northwick Park Hospital site. We understand from Northwick Park and St. Mark's NHS Trust that there are also patients occupying general medical and surgical beds of all ages, which would include a proportion of elderly people.

Doctors

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list each medical speciality and number of current vacancies for qualified doctors in it. [21864]

Data on vacant posts are difficult to interpret and do not necessarily imply a shortage. The census is a snap of 30 September each year. Some vacancies will be wholly or partly filled by locums. For others National Health Service trusts may find alternative ways to provide the service rather than re-advertising. The numbers give no indication of how long the post has been empty; some of these will be in the process of being filled.

Health Service Chairmen and Directors

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current level of remuneration for (a) chairmen and (b) non-executive directors of (i) NHS health trusts, (ii) health authorities and (c) NHS Executive regional committees; what plans he has to review the level of remuneration; and if he will make a statement. [22114]

Mr. Milburn: Non-executive directors on National Heath Service trusts and health authorities receive a payment of £5,000 per annum. Chairman of trusts receive rates of payment according to the annual level of turnover of the trust involved. The current rates payable are as follows:

	Turnover (£)	Rate payable (£)

Band 2	28,792,000 to 68,781,000	17,145
Band 3	2,342,000 to 28,670,000	15,125

Chairmen of health authorities receive rates of payment according to the annual level of cash allocation of the health authority involved. The current rates payable are as follows:

	Cash allocation (£)	Rate payable (£)

Band 3	69,700,000 to 163,775,000	15,125

National Health Service Regional Chairmen receive an annual payment of £20,925.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no immediate plans to review the levels of remuneration for either non-executives or chairmen.

Anti-depressants

Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will issue guidance for doctors on the maximum length of time patients should be allowed to take SSRI anti-depressant drugs; and if he will make a statement. [21881]

Mr. Milburn: Guidance is available in the British National Formulary, which is issued twice a year, the Drugs and Therapeutics Bulletin and the Medicines Resources Centre Bulletin, which are all issued free of charge to doctors. Copies of all the publications are available in the Library.

Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what has been the cost to the NHS of anti-depressants prescribed in each of the last four years; and what proportion of this was attributable to SSRIs; [21879]

(2) how many anti-depressants have been prescribed by community pharmacists in England in each of the last four years; and what proportion of these were SSRIs. [21880]

Mr. Milburn: Pharmacists do not prescribe any medication on National Health Service prescription forms. The information on prescriptions written by doctors is shown in the table.

City Hospitals NHS Trust, Sunderland

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to announce the names of the appointees for the remaining vacancies for non-executive directors on the board of City Hospitals NHS Trust, Sunderland; and if he will list the appointments made since October in respect of the chair and non-executive directors, indicating their (a) NHS experience, (b) previous service as non-executive and chair of an NHS trust or health authority, (c) present occupation, (d) home area or address, (e) term of appointment and (f) expected remuneration. [22048]

Mr. Milburn: The appointments made to the trust board by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State at the beginning of November were as follows:

Mr. David Graham—Chairman

Mr. Graham has already served one four year term as chair of the trust. He is retired, having previously been managing director of Sunderland and South Shields Water Company. He lives in Sunderland.

Mrs. Ailsa Martin—Non-Executive Director

Mrs. Martin is currently co-ordinator of the Sunderland Carers Centre. She has had no previous service on National Health Service boards and lives in Washington.

Professor Jeffrey Brown—Non-executive Director

A pharmacist by profession, Professor Brown has had no previous service on NHS boards. He is currently Deputy Chief Executive and Pro Vice Chancellor of the University of Sunderland and lives in Sunderland.

Mr. Graham Morris—Non-Executive Director

Mr. Morris was employed as a Medical Laboratory Scientific Officer from 1980 to 1987. He has had no previous service on NHS boards. He is currently employed as a research assistant and constituency agent for a Member of Parliament. He lives in Seaham.

The posts attract payment of £19,285 per annum for the chairman and £5,000 for the non-executives. All the appointments are for four years. The two remaining vacancies will be filled as soon as possible.

Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work

Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the outcome of the fundamental review of the functions of the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work; and if he will make a statement. [22479]

General Care Council

Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the consultation paper on the General Care Council will be published. [20744]

Mr. Boateng: We are today publishing the report of the review on behalf of the United Kingdom Ministers responsible for sponsoring the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work (CCETSW). Copies of the report have been placed in the Library.

I and my hon. Friends will be considering in detail the conclusions and recommendations in the report which is the result of an extensive consultation exercise and we intend to act on the recommendations in the report designed to secure efficiency and good value for money in the way the functions are carried out.

I announced in the House on 3 July 1997, Official Report, columns 231–32, our intention to establish a General Social Services Council. This was one of the matters to which the review of CCETSW was to have regard. I and my hon. Friends will be giving further thought to how best to build effective UK links on the regulation of the workforce consistent with the Government's plans for devolution. The report of the review paves the way for the establishment of a General Social Care Council (GSCC), as we now intend to call it, and makes clear the vital importance of drawing a close relationship between the regulation of training and of the workforce.

The Government have not decided that it is unnecessary to issue a further consultation document on its proposals to establish the GSCC. We intend to publish our legislative proposals in a White Paper in the spring after further discussion of the detailed issues within the Government and will all the key stakeholders. These will include service users, employers in all sectors, staff interests and professional bodies. In preparation, for and to the benefit of, the GSCC we will carry out a formal stage two of the review based on appropriate recommendations in the report to examine issues of effectiveness and value for money.

CCETSW continues to play its vital role in ensuring an appropriately qualified and trained workforce. Achieving that objective remains central to our approach, but we do not see the need for a separate body for the regulation of training in the aftermath of the establishment of the GSCC.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines his Department issues to NHS trusts in respect of the sale of health care items normally issued free. [21905]

Mr. Milburn: Section 1 of the National Health Service Act 1977 requires that NHS services provided under the Act to NHS patients must be free of charge, except where the making and recovery of charges is expressly provided for by legislation.

AIDS

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that AIDS patients have access to the most appropriate treatment regardless of where they live. [22170]

Ms Jowell: The Government allocate substantial resources to the National Health Service for the treatment of people with HIV/AIDS. For 1997–98, the budget amounts to £199.3 million and includes an extra £14 million in response to the cost pressures following the introduction of combination antiretroviral drug therapies for people with HIV and AIDS. The budget is broadly allocated in line with where people are treated.

In 1998–99, a further £23 million has been provided in recognition of the continued cost pressures of these new therapies which are proving effective so far in delaying the progression of HIV and AIDS, £20 million of the additional funds have been distributed according to where people with HIV/AIDS live. From 1 April 1998, health authorities will therefore take responsibility for their residents who present for HIV/AIDS treatment for the first time. The remaining £3 million has been allocated to districts with the highest caseload in recognition of the extra pressures they face with regard to combination therapies.

Computers (Century Date Change)

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice her Department has issued to NHS trusts on the preparation of IT systems for the year 2000. [22057]

Mr. Milburn: An initial Executive Letter EL(96)80 was issued by the National Health Service Executive in September 1996, entitled "Problems arising from the Year 2000 date change" together with guidance on what to do. Copies are available in the Library.

Further advice was issued in October 1997 in the form of EL(97)59 and HSG(97)40, which outlined urgent action to be taken by chief executives of health authorities and NHS trusts in order to prevent problems in systems and equipment which could fail as a result of the Year 2000 date change.

Guidance on managing the risks of year 2000 is being released to all NHS Year 2000 project managers at the end of December 1997.

Mental Health Tribunals

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many, and which, mental health tribunals are currently inquorate. [21910]

Mr. Boateng: All Mental Health Review Tribunals are held in accordance with Schedule 2 of the Mental Health Act 1983.

Drugs

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what mechanisms he proposes to ensure that expensive drugs of proven clinical value are available on the basis of clinical need. [21928]

Mr. Milburn: The White Paper, "The New NHS", sets out the Government's plans for the National Health Service. National Service Frameworks and clinical guidelines will be developed with the profession, and will challenge and address variations not based on the health needs and wishes of local people.

The National Institute for Clinical Excellence announced in the White Paper will develop and disseminate clinical guidelines based on relevant evidence of clinical and cost-effectiveness.

It will be for individual clinicians to judge what is the best treatment for particular patients. This will provide national consistency, while still allowing appropriate local and individual responsiveness.

Social Services (Fees and Charges)

Mr. Rooney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what sums have been raised in fees and charges by each local authority social services department in the years (a) 1994–95, (b) 1995–96 and (c) 1996–97. [22158]

Mr. Boateng: The table shows the amounts of income from fees and charges recorded for each local authority area for 1994–95 and 1995–96. Data are not yet available for 1996–97.

Incontinence

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is his latest estimate of the number of people who suffer from incontinence in Coventry. [21904]

Mr. Boateng: The latest estimate of people suffering with some form of incontinence in Coventry is approximately sixteen and a half thousand.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Drug-related Offences

15. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the current prison population were convicted of a drugs-related offence. [20173]

Ms Quin: Provisional information for 31 October 1997 shows that there were 368 convicted unsentenced and 7,377 sentenced prisoners held in prisons in England and Wales for drug offences. This represents 14.3 per cent. of the convicted prison population.

29. Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what estimate he has made of the proportion of acquisitive crime which is linked to the use of illegal drugs. [20187]

Mr. George Howarth: We hope to publish early in the new year important research which indicates that there is indeed a very strong relationship between the misuse of drugs and acquisitive crime.

Mrs. Betty Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to tackle the link between drugs and crime. [20155]

Mr George Howarth: A new treatment and testing order, included as one of the measures in the Crime and Disorder Bill, will give courts the power to require drug misusing offenders to undergo treatment. The new order will be rigorously enforced and include the use of drug testing to enable the courts to monitor the progress of offenders at review hearings.

In addition, a Home Office Drugs Prevention Initiative study is testing the impact of drug treatment interventions in the criminal justice system—from arrest through to sentence and beyond—to refer people with drug problems to drug treatment programmes.

Further measures are likely to be recommended by the new United Kingdom Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator as part of his comprehensive review of Government action against drugs, while the Home Office's research programme will continue to shed light on the nature of the links between drugs and crime and to inform action against both.

Drug Rehabilitation Establishments

18. Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the drug rehabilitation establishments which the Under-Secretary, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) has visited since 2 May. [20176]

Mr. George Howarth: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Chapman) today.

Community Sentencing

19. Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the extra work which increased use of community sentencing and electronic tagging will place on the police force. [20177]

Ms Quin: There has been no specific research to assess the impact of the increased use of community sentences. However, there is likely to be an increase in the number of warrants served by the police on offenders who have failed to comply with the conditions of an order and who have not answered a summons to appear at court in connection with breach proceedings.

Offenders who have breached the terms of their electronic tag are returned to the court by the monitoring contractors. However, if an offender then fails to appear in court, a warrant for arrest is issued. Too few such cases have arisen during the current trials of electronic monitoring to enable a meaningful estimate of police costs to be made.

Under the new Home Detention Curfew, suitable prisoners will be subjected to electronic tagging. Prisoners who breach their curfew can be returned tc custody. It is too soon to know what the possible impact on the police of this will be.

Voluntary Sector

20. Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he will bring forward to improve the relationship between the Government and the voluntary sector. [20178]

Mr. Michael: The Government place high priority on developing and strengthening a partnership between Government and the voluntary sector. The main vehicle for this will be a Compact between government and the voluntary sector on which we are currently collaborating with the sector and which will set out the principles which should govern the relationship.

28. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many meetings he has had since 1 May with members of voluntary organisations to discuss assistance for the voluntary sector. [20186]

Mr. Michael: Since 1 May, when responsibility for the voluntary sector and for volunteering was returned to the Home Office, there have been well over 100 meetings with members of voluntary organisations involving myself or my right hon. Friend. We have also assisted Ministers in other Departments, notably the Department for Education and Employment, with wide ranging consultation on policies which have a direct impact on the work of voluntary organisations.

Youth Crime

21. Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has for reducing youth crime. [20179]

Mr. Michael: The Government's plans for reducing youth crime are set out in the White Paper "No More Excuses" which was published on 27 November. These include proposals to speed up the youth offender proceedings, replace repeat cautions with a new reprimand and Final Warning scheme, introduce new community based sentences and established a Youth Justice Board for England and Wales, and local Youth Offending Teams. A new statutory aim for the youth justice system will place a clear emphasis on preventing re-offending. These proposals are contained in the Crime and Disorder Bill currently before Parliament.

Laser Pens

22. Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on the use of laser pens as weapons. [20180]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Home Office has received 33 letters from hon. Members and 35 letters and one telephone call from members of the public.

Police Pensions

23. Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of the latest annual police budgets in England and Wales is allocated to meeting the cost of pensions; what was the comparable figure five years ago; and what is his estimated figure for five years ahead. [20181]

Mr. Michael: In their returns to the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, police authorities in England and Wales estimated that net policy pension costs will be 11.9 per cent. of total net expenditure in 1997–98. The comparable figure for 1992–93 is 8.2 per cent. There are no estimates for five years ahead.

32. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reform the police pension scheme. [20191]

Mr. Michael: An inter-Department review of police pensions has been considering whether new recruits should belong to a reformed police pension scheme and whether changes are necessary to the current medical retirement procedures. We hope to issue a consultation paper in the new year and we will invite all interested parties to contribute to the debate.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, by police force, the cost (a) in cash and (b) as a percentage of budget, of pension provision for each of the past five financial years, and in each case the budgets for (i) 1997–98, (ii) 1998–99 and (iii) 1999–2000. [21932]

Mr. Michael: The information requested in respect of years 1992–93 to 1997–98 is set out in the table. Police authority budgets are set in the beginning of each year following the revenue settlement announced by the Government. Budget information for 1998–99 and 1999–2000 is therefore not available. The cost of pension provision for 1998–1999 and 1999–2000 is also not available. The costs will in part be influenced by retirements in each preceding year.

Parliamentary Elections

24. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the commission established to inquire into alternative voting systems for parliamentary elections. [20182]

Mr. Straw: The Independent Commission on the Voting System will begin its work early in the new year and has been asked to report within 12 months.

Closed Circuit Television

25. Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what priority he plans to give to spending on closed circuit television after 1998. [20183]

Mr. Michael: In total, £9 million will be spent on CCTV in 1998–99 financial year. Plans and priorities for spending thereafter are being examined in the Comprehensive Spending Review of all public expenditure, with a view to ensuring that taxpayers' money is being spent effectively in order to meet the Government's manifesto commitments.

European Parliament Elections

26. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ensure that voters have the right to vote for an individual candidate in elections to the European Parliament. [20184]

Mr. George Howarth: We believe that the simple list system that the European Parliamentary Elections Bill provides for is the most appropriate electoral system for elections to the European Parliament. However, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has said that he is prepared to consider the arguments for introducing a system in which voters can vote either for a party list or for an individual candidate on the list.

Police (Surrey)

27. Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of future police numbers in Surrey. [20185]

Mr. Michael: Under legislation passed by the previous Government in 1994, it is for the Chief Constable of Surrey to determine the number of police officers in the force on the basis of the resources available to him. Ministers have no direct control over police numbers. I understand there were 1,608 police officers in Surrey at the end of September, 98 fewer than in March 1992.

Bribery

30. Mr. Fizpatrick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to make bribery of hon. Members an offence. [20188]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government are committed to tackling all forms of corruption, including the bribery of hon. Members. My right hon. Friend expects to make a statement on the reform of the law in this area early next year, taking account of the results of the consultation exercise which he launched in June and of proposals which the Law Commission are preparing and which are awaited. He will also take account of any further recommendations which the Committee on Standards in Public Life might make and of the views of the Joint Committee on Parliamentary Privilege.

Witnesses (Protection)

31. Mr. Cawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ensure that vulnerable witnesses are afforded greater protection in court. [20189]

Mr. Michael: On 13 June, we announced an urgent, wide ranging review of the way in which vulnerable and intimidated witnesses, including those with communication or learning difficulties, are treated by the criminal justice system, with the aim of assisting them to give their best evidence in court. The Interdepartmental Working Group, which is taking forward the review, will report to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary shortly and its report will be considered by Ministers as soon as possible in the New Year.

Human Rights

33. Mr. Khabra: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to implement the incorporation of the European convention on human rights. [20192]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Human Rights Bill [Lords] is currently being considered in another place. Before it can be implemented (if enacted), we shall need to ensure that courts and tribunals receive adequate training to enable them to deal confidently with Convention points in the cases that come before them.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will indicate which clauses in the Human Rights Bill [Lords] require the court to produce a decision on the morality of the conduct in any case in addition to its compliance with the bare letter of the law. [21926]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Whether morality becomes involved may be a moot point, depending on the definition of morality. It is arguable that morality has a role in non-convention judgments in our courts.

Clause 2 of the Bill requires courts to take Convention jurisprudence into account when determining a question which has arisen in connection with a Convention right.

Clause 3 requires legislation to be interpreted as far as possible in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights. Clause 6 makes it unlawful for a court, as a public authority, to act in a way which is incompatible with the Convention rights. Taken together, these provisions will require the courts to consider whether, for example, conduct which interferes with a Convention right is necessary in a democratic society for one of the reasons specified in the relevant Article of the Convention.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he plans to issue guidance to assist the courts in reaching judgments on the morality of conduct in any case when interpreting the Human Rights Bill [Lords] should it become law. [21925]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Judicial training in the provisions of the Bill, relating among other things to the interpretation of Convention jurisprudence, is a matter for the Judicial Studies Board.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the bodies which the Government deem to be public authorities in the Human Rights Bill [Lords]. [21927]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Clause 6 of the Human Rights Bill makes it unlawful for a public authority to act in a way which is incompatible with the convention rights. It provides that a public authority includes a court or tribunal, and any person certain of whose functions are functions of a public nature. My right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor explained during Committee stage in another place why we had adopted this approach rather than having a list of public authorities.

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what considerations he bases his policy that the absence of written guarantees of freedom acts as a serious threat to liberty. [21924]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We believe that the absence of written guarantees of freedom is a more serious threat to liberty than their presence. The freedom of an individual to do anything which is not prohibited by law provides inadequate protection against the misuse of power by the State. It has failed to protect a number of people in cases in which the European Court of Human Rights has found a violation of the European Convention on Human Rights by the United Kingdom.

Our policy is to make it possible for laws and practices in the United Kingdom to be tested in our own courts for compatibility with the rights and freedoms guaranteed under the European Convention on Human Rights. We have set out the considerations which have led us to this view in the White Paper "Rights Brought Home" (Cm 3782).

Racial Violence

34. Mr. Tims: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many incidents of racial violence have been recorded in each of the last five years. [20193]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The total number of racial incidents recorded by the police in England and Wales for the last five years were:

	Number
1992	7,734
1993–94	11,006
1994–95	11,878
1995–96	12,222
1996–97	13,151

These are incidents recorded under the Association of Chief Police Officers' definition of a racial incident:
"any incident in which it appears to the reporting or investigating officer that the complaint involves an element of racial motivation, or any incident which includes an allegation of racial motivation made by any person".

Under data collection requirements agreed by member states within Europe, figures giving details of the numbers of serious racial incidents have been submitted to the European Union for 1994–95 and 1995–96. The 1994–95 figures showed that, of the 11,878 racial incidents recorded by the police, 564 were in respect of serious crime. Of these, four were murders; three were attempted murders; 161 were attacks involving explosives/arson and 396 were serious assaults. In 1995–96, of the 12,222 racial incidents recorded by the police, 440 were in respect of serious crime. Of these, two were murders; 163 were attacks involving explosives/arson; and 275 were serious assaults.

Shotguns

35. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce tighter controls on the ownership of shotguns. [20194]

Mr. Michael: The Government have made it clear that once the complete ban on handguns has been achieved, we shall consider whether further steps are required to secure public safety. We will consult widely with all interested parties if further steps are considered necessary but we have no preconceived ideas on shotguns or any other specific firearms.

Police and Probation Services (Surrey)

36. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to meet representatives from the Surrey police and probation services to discuss proposed funding levels. [20195]

Mr. Michael: I wrote to the Chairman of Surrey Police Authority on 14 November 1997 offering to meet representatives to discuss proposed funding levels for 1998–99. We have had no similar request from Surrey Probation Service for a meeting.

Immigration and Asylum Cases (Judicial Review)

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) statistics his Department collates and (b) estimates he has made in respect of the number of (i) applications for leave to apply for judicial review in immigration and asylum cases that were received in the Queen's Bench Divisional Court indicating which (1) were allowed, (2) were refused and (3) lapsed and (ii) substantive applications for judicial review in immigration and asylum cases that were disposed of by the Divisional Court indicating those applications that were (A) allowed, (B) dismissed and (C) withdrawn in (x) 1996 and (y) 1997; and if he will list the proportion of applications in which his Department conceded the matters at issue prior to the court hearing. [21321]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The available information is given in the table. Reliable information regarding the proportion of applications conceded by the Home Office can be obtained only through examination of individual case records and is therefore available only at disproportional cost.

Applications for leave to apply for judicial review and applications for judicial review, made in respect of immigration cases[1] 1996 and 1 January to 31 October 1997

[1] Includes asylum and non-asylum immigration cases.
[2] This figure is applications refused but not renewed, leave granted but no notice of motion lodged and applications withdrawn or otherwise not proceeded with at this stage.

Anti-social Behaviour

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures his Department is proposing to tackle anti-social behaviour; and if he will make a statement. [21396]

Mr. Michael: The Government regard anti-social behaviour and the harassment or intimidation of neighbours as completely unacceptable. The Crime and Disorder Bill contains provisions to enable the police or a local authority to apply for an Anti-Social Behaviour Order prohibiting an individual from behaving in this way. Breach of the order will be a criminal offence.

The Bill also contains provisions for police and local authorities together to identify and tackle local problems of crime and disorder.

Evidence

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the operation of section 32 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 in respect of provision for the attendance of witnesses to be dispensed with in certain cases and for evidence to be given by way of a television link; and what plans he has to extend its provisions to cover other classes or proceedings. [21512]

Mr. Michael: An independent evaluation of the provisions for the use of television links for child witnesses was conducted on behalf of the Home Office in 1991 by Professor Graham Davies and Elizabeth Noon of Leicester University who concluded that the live link had a positive and facilitating effect on the courtroom testimony of children. Section 32 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, which allowed children under 14 years of age to give evidence by way of live television links, was extended by the Criminal Justice Act 1991 to include children under 17 years of age in cases involving sexual assault. The possible further extension of its use is one of the issues being considered by the inter-departmental working group on vulnerable or intimidated witnesses which was announced by my right hon. Friend on 13 June.

Police (Body Armour)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with chief constables concerning the wearing of body armour by police officers; and if he will make a statement. [21579]

Mr. Michael: Decisions about whether to issue body armour, and the selection of body armour, are operational matters for chief officers. The role of the Home Office is to ensure that, in making such decisions, they have before them the best available expert advice, and this is provided by the Home Office's Police Scientific Development Branch which also provides expert advice to the self-defence committee of the Association of Chief Police Officers.

Both my right hon. Friend and I take an interest in such matters when we meet chief constables and other police officers. In particular, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has informed my right hon. Friend about the position in the Metropolitan Police during discussions with my right hon. Friend in his capacity as police authority for the Metropolitan Police. The Police Scientific Development Branch has, in collaboration with the Association of Chief Police Officers, issued a manual to all chief police officers containing guidance on how to select body armour, and expert evaluations of a wide range of body armour. The manual is updated to keep abreast of the latest technical developments and to assist individual chief officers in their decision making.

Sexual and Violent Offences

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research he has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the effect on victims of serious sexual offences of being asked questions by the defendant personally in the course of a trial. [21515]

Mr. Michael: There has been no specific or separate research on this issue but research into the process of rape cases is currently under way. It is often a particularly frightening and traumatic experience for the victims of serious sexual offences to have to give evidence. Ministers have expressed concern about the additional impact of extended questioning by the defendant personally, while appreciating the need to protect the right of the defence to test the evidence against him. This issue is currently being considered by the inter-departmental review of vulnerable or intimidated witnesses which was announced by my right hon. Friend on 13 June 1997.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Flynn) of 21 July 1997, Official Report, column 389, when he expects his Department's research into the process of rape cases to be completed; and if he will publish it. [21578]

Mr. Michael: The research into the processing of rape cases by the criminal justice system, being undertaken by the Home Office Research and Statistics Directorate, is expected to be completed in the second half of 1998. The findings will be published.

An interim report from the study, setting out the emerging findings from the first stage of the study, has already been placed in the Library.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many offenders (a) in total and (b) aged under 21 years convicted of (i) rape and (ii) attempted rape received sentences of more than three months but less than four years' imprisonment in the last year for which figures are available: [21573]

(2) how many offenders aged under 21 years and convicted of offences involving (a) sex and (b) violence were sentenced to detention in a young offenders' institution for periods of more than three months but less than four years in the last year for which figures are available. [21574]

(3) how many offenders convicted of offences involving (a) sex and (b) violence were sentenced to periods of imprisonment of more than three months but less than four years in the last year for which figures are available. [21513]

Mr. Michael: The information is given in the table.

[1] Includes unsuspended imprisonment and for persons aged under 21 detention in a young offender institution.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the willingness of victims of serious sexual offences to come forward with complaints and co-operate in criminal proceedings. [21510]

Mr. Michael: The Home Office Research and Statistics Directorate is undertaking a study into the processing of rape cases after they have been reported to the police. This study updates a previous Home Office study of rape cases reported to the police in 1985, the results of which were published in 1992. A copy of the interim report on this study has already been placed in the Library and this shows that the withdrawal of the allegation by the victim is one of the significant reasons for rape cases failing to be prosecuted. The final stages of the research will explore the reasons for withdrawal or other failure to proceed with a case.

The Research and Statistics Directorate has also recently conducted a literature review to support the work of the inter-departmental working group which is looking at ways of assisting vulnerable witnesses, including victims of serious sexual offences. This review will be published in 1998 as part of the working group's report.

The British Crime Survey has always included measurement of sexual victimisation among women and whether incidents were reported to the police or not. However, a new self-completion approach was tried in the 1994 sweep, to overcome obvious measurement problems. The findings of this study were published in the international journal "Studies on Crime and Crime Prevention" (Volume 6 No. 2 1997). The sexual victimisation self-completion component will be repeated in the 1998 British Crime Survey. This time, both men and women will be asked about their experiences of sexual crimes.

It must be acknowledged that research in this area is difficult to conduct because:

(a) of the sensitive nature of the offences;

(b) of difficulties in identifying victims of unreported offences;

(c) reasons for not reporting or not co-operating in criminal proceedings may also be reasons for not co-operating with research in this area.

Ministers are determined to do everything possible to get a true picture of the problem and to make the system more accessible, sympathetic and effective in dealing with these crimes.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many defendants convicted of (a) rape or attempted rape, (b) indecent assault on a woman (c) and other sexual offences to which part I of the Sex Offenders Act 1997 applies, personally asked questions of their victim in the course of their trial. [21514]

Mr. Michael: The information requested is not collected centrally. The Government's manifesto included a commitment to provide greater protection for victims in rape and serious sexual offence trials. On 13 June, my right hon. Friend announced the establishment of an inter-departmental review to improve the way in which such persons are treated within the criminal justice system and this includes the consideration of ways of preventing unrepresented defendants from personally cross-examining the victim.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to prevent defendants personally cross-examining victims in the course of trials involving serious sexual offences. [21921]

Mr. Michael: This issue is currently being considered by the inter-departmental review of vulnerable and intimidated witnesses which was announced by my right hon. Friend on 13 June 1997.

Exclusion Orders

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many exclusion orders under the Licensed Premises (Exclusion of Persons) Act 1980 have been applied for and granted by the magistrate's courts in each year since 1992. [21852]

Mr. Michael: The imposition of exclusion orders under the Licensed Premises (Exclusion of Persons) Act 1980 is at the discretion of the courts when an offender is convicted of an offence committed in licensed premises and the court is satisfied that in committing that offence he resorted, or offered or threatened to resort, to violence. The imposition of such an order is not dependent upon an application by another person.

Home Office figures show that the following number of exclusion orders was imposed by magistrates' courts in each year since 1992:

1992: 58
1993: 45
1994: 21
1995: 21
1996: 23

On 15 October, we issued a circular reminding the courts of their powers under the Act to impose exclusion orders on offenders.

Female Prisoners

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which prisons and young offenders institutions in England and Wales were holding females aged (a) 16, (b) 17 and (c) 18 years of age on the last date for which figures are available. [21601]

Ms Quin [holding answer 18 December 1997]: The information requested as at 30 November 1997 is given in the table.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will collate crime statistics by parliamentary constituency. [21676]

Mr. Michael: It is not practical for the Home Office to collate recorded crime statistics in this way. The statistics which are collected centrally are supplied by individual police forces for the whole of their own force area. Many forces break down statistics for their own purposes into smaller areas such as the division or sub-division, but these do not necessarily equate to parliamentary constituency boundaries. In some cases, it may be possible for such local information to be used as "building blocks" for a constituency profile. Some forces do use geographical software to "map" incidents and offences within their area for a variety of purposes. In the future, such analysis of data will become increasingly important in informing the local crime and disorder audit work of police and local authorities in preparation for their joint responsibilities as proposed in the Crime and Disorder Bill.

Prison Visitors (Drug Offences)

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of those arrested in relation to possible drug-related offences while visiting prisons were (a) charged and (b) convicted of a criminal offence arising there from in the most recent year for which figures are available. [21616]

Mr. Michael: The court proceedings data which are collected centrally do identify convictions for offences under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971, as amended, but they do not identify the charge originally made nor the location of the offence.

Young Prisoners

Mr. Allan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) boys and (b) girls aged under 18 years are currently in (i) prison and (ii) young offenders' institutions following (1) sentence and (2) remand into custody; and what is the projected under 18 prison and young offender institution population on 1 January 1998. [21536]

Ms Quin [holding answer 18 December 1997]: The information requested about the current prison population is given in the table.

The number of male young offenders (aged under 21 years) in prison is expected to be 10,400 (7,700 sentenced, 2,700 remand) on 31 December 1997. Monthly projections are not prepared for the under-18 prison population, but during the financial year 1997–98, the population of male prisoners under 18 years is estimated to average 2,500 (1,700 sentenced, 800 remand). There is no separate projection for female young offenders.

Road Policing

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make road policing a national core policing objective. [21680]

Mr. Michael: It is not the purpose of the national key objectives for the police to provide a list of all the essential services and tasks of the Police Service and currently I have no plans to make traffic policing the subject of a key objective. When my right hon. Friend wrote to chief constables on 3 November to announce the key objectives for 1998–99, he stressed that traffic policing is a central part of the police's responsibilities and is expected to play a full part in achieving the overall objectives for the police service, particularly in relation to community safety and crime reduction and in achieving a safer environment on the roads.

Immigration Appeals

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) asylum appeals and (b) other immigration appeals are currently outstanding. [21629]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: As at 30 November 1997, an estimated 37,000 immigration appeals, excluding dependants, were awaiting determination. Of these, approximately 25,750 were asylum-related appeals and 11,250 were in connection with other immigration cases.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the statutory authority which permits the police to share personal data with local authorities and vice versa; and if he will make a statement. [22129]

Mr. Michael: There is no general statutory power to disclose personal data. Where the police consider that it is in the interests of the prevention or detection of crime that personal data should be disclosed, they may do so under common law powers. General guidance to the police service on the disclosure of such data is given in the Code of Practice for Data Protection produced by the Association of Chief Police Officers.

We intend to issue next year inter-departmental guidance, to local authorities among others, which will cover the disclosure of personal information.

Local authorities may wish to reach agreements with the police on the disclosure of personal data. Such agreements must operate within the terms of the Data Protection Act 1984.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has signed a certificate under the provisions of section 27 of the Data Protection Act 1984 with respect to those personal data which are used by the Security Service to help the police fight serious crime. [22136]

Mr. Straw: No. I have had no occasion to do so.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Security Service will adopt the relevant sections of the Code of Practice on Data Protection published by the Association of Chief Police Officers in respect of those personal data which are used by the service to help the police fight serious crime. [22137]

Mr. Straw: The arrangements under which the Security Service discharges its responsibilities in relation to protection of data are a matter for the Director General of the Security Service. I see no reason to require the Security Service to adopt in whole or in part a Code of Practice intended to deal with arrangements for data protection within police forces.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Government policy towards access to criminal records with particular reference to (a) the availability of a criminal conviction certificate under section 112 of the Police Act 1997 and (b) enforced subject access. [22133]

Mr. Michael: We are currently reviewing the provisions relating to criminal records checks in Part V of the Police Act 1997. Our top priority in doing so is the protection of children and other vulnerable people. We shall consider criminal conviction certificates as part of this review.

The White Paper "Data Protection: The Government's Proposals" made it clear that the Government intend to put an end to the practice of enforced subject access.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what investigation the Security Service has conducted into whether it holds personal data for purposes unconnected with a national security purpose. [22135]

Mr. Straw: The Director General of the Security Service is under a statutory duty to ensure that no information is obtained by the Service except so far as necessary for the proper discharge of its functions. The functions of the Service are to protect national security; to safeguard the economic well-being of the United Kingdom against threats posed by the actions or intentions of persons outside the British Islands and to act in support of the activities of police forces and other law enforcement agencies in the prevention and detection of serious crime. It follows that the Service may hold personal data which it has obtained in pursuit of any of these functions.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the review into whether the Security Service should register under the Data Protection Act 1984 began; and when it is expected to be concluded. [22134]

Mr. Straw: A review was begun in autumn 1996. It was subsumed in the consideration of plans for fresh data protection legislation to implement the European Community Data Protection Directive. The Government's Bill to implement that Directive will come before Parliament in the new year.

Passports (Processing)

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state for each year since 1992 the average period between the receipt of a passport application and the provision of a passport in (a) England, (b) Wales, (c) Scotland and (d) Northern Ireland. [22022]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Information is not available to answer the question by country. The list shows the average time it has taken the UK Passport Agency to process all straightforward, properly completed applications made in the United Kingdom in each year (commencing on 1 April) since 1992.

1992–93: nine working days;
1993–94: eight working days;
1994–95: seven working days;
1995–96: six working days;
1996–97: six working days.

The average so far for 1997–98 is nine working days due to an unexpectedly high demand.

Mr. Fearn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each year since 1992 the number of (a) passports lost and (b) other official documents lost, in the passport offices of (i) England, (ii) Scotland, (iii) Wales and (iv) Northern Ireland. [22023]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Information on passports and other official documents lost in the UK Passport Agency's offices are not separately recorded, but the incidence of such loss is comparatively rare. Lost passports and documents submitted in support of passport applications are replaced free of charge to the applicant.

Deportations

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons aged over 65 years (a) had their application to remain in the United Kingdom refused, (b) were ordered to be deported and (c) were deported, in each of the last five years. [21843]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 19 December 1997]: The available information on refusals of applications for leave to remain, deportation orders made and deportation removals are given in the table. The numbers removed do not include persons removed as illegal entrants or under port procedures.

Table 1: Refusals of leave to remain and deportation action taken against persons aged over 65 years[1], 1994 to 1997[2]

[7] Some removals may relate to deportation orders make in previous periods.

Organised Crime

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress is being made in the implementation of each of the recommendations in the Action Plan Against Organised Crime adopted by the European Council in June. [21706]

Mr. Michael [holding answer 19 December 1997]: The Action Plan contains 30 individual recommendations with target dates ranging from the end of 1997 to the end of 1999. Work has begun on many, but it would be premature to report on progress with each of them now. It will be an important task under the forthcoming United Kingdom Presidency to prepare the progress report that the European Council has requested for its meeting in Cardiff in June. Particular achievements under the Luxembourg Presidency have been:

- the establishment of a new multidisciplinary group on organised crime to drive this work forward (recommendation 22)
- finalisation of the Naples II Convention on Customs co-operation (recommendation 14)
- agreement in principle of a funding programme for the fight against organised crime, the Falcone Programme (recommendation 11)

Substantial progress has also been made with a joint action on criminalisation of participation in a criminal organisation (recommendation 17), arrangements for mutual evaluation (recommendation 15) and the establishment of a judicial co-operation network (recommendation 25).

Immigration

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the Instructions to Immigration Service and Home Office staff on dealing with immigration cases. [21699]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 19 December 1997]: It is my intention to make these instructions available as soon as possible in the new year. There is a considerable amount of material, extending to many volumes, and we are examining how it can be disclosed. It is likely that a text will be made available in the Library and, given the amount of material, we are considering whether, if possible, to make it available on the Internet for ease of access. This will be a substantial step in Open Government within the terms of the Code of Practice on Open Government.

Animal Experimentation

Mrs. Humble: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many animals, of which species, have been used for military research under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 for (a) testing submarine escape mechanisms (b) training bomb disposal experts and (c) research into Gulf War Syndrome in the last five years; what is the nature of the procedures involved; and what is their severity rating. [22037]

Mr. George Howarth: Military research is not a category of work permissible under section 5(3) of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. I understand, however, from the Ministry of Defence that the Environmental Sciences Department of Defence Evaluation and Research Agency carries out research aimed at providing the Royal Navy with advice on the safe pressure exposure limits for escape from a sunken submarine. The procedures used are exposure to altered environmental pressure and gaseous pressure and are of moderate severity. The species of animal used is the goat.

The number of animals used in the past five years is:

1993: 44
1994: 14
1995: 10
1996: 2
1997: 17

No training with the Armed Forces which involves the experimental use of animals is undertaken. The Defence Animal Centre at Melton Mowbray trains animals for military duties, including dogs used for search and patrol duties. This training is not for scientific or experimental purposes and so is not regulated under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. There has been no research involving the use of animals specifically directed at Gulf War illnesses.

Police Officers

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by police force the number of (a) constables, (b) sergeants and (c) other ranks in post on 2 May. [22090]

Mr. Michael: The information collected centrally on police numbers relates to officers in post at the end of March and September each year. The table shows police numbers by rank in each force as at 31 March 1997.

Handguns

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have been (a) killed and (b) injured by (i) legally owned handguns and (ii) handguns illegally owned or used in each police force area in England and Wales in each year since 1992; and for how many deaths and injuries it has not been determined whether the handgun used was legally or illegally held. [21838]

Mr. Michael [holding answer 19 December 1997]: In the past, information as to whether or not firearms used in offences were held legally has not been collected centrally as a matter of routine in England and Wales. A special exercise was conducted last year to find out whether the guns used in homicide were licensed or not. This covered the years 1992 to 1994, and out of a total of 90 homicides involving the use of a handgun, information was available in 62 cases to show that four were held legally and 58 held illegally by the suspect. The latter figure would, of course, include any handguns used in homicide which had been stolen from a legal owner.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many handguns were illegally taken from (a) firearms dealers, (b) police, (c) the armed forces, (d) members of the public, (e) a common carrier while in transit and (f) firearms clubs, for each year from 1992 to the latest available date and for each police force area; what was the largest number taken at any one time; and what were the descriptions of the firearms taken as recorded by the police. [21839]

Mr. Michael [holding answer 19 December 1997]: The information requested is not available centrally in the form requested. The information that is collected and published shows the number of notifiable offences of burglary and theft recorded by the police in which firearms were reported to have been stolen by type of principal weapon and location. (This is in table 3.12 of Chapter 3, "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales"—copies of which are in the Library).

From 1996, the basis of the figures was changed to show the number of weapons misappropriated (defined as stolen, obtained by fraud or forgery etc., or handled dishonestly). Such figures by individual police force area could be made available only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many handguns taken from their legal owners in each year since 1992 in each police force area were subsequently recovered by the police; how many in each such area in each year are known to have been used in the commission of armed crime; and what percentage these figures represent of total thefts of handguns and of total crime in which handguns are known or believed to be used. [21836]

Mr. Michael [holding answer 19 December 1997]: The information requested is not available centrally. However, research published by the Home Office in 1994, based on investigations into 643 offences in which firearms were misappropriated in 1992, showed that about one in six of those stolen was recovered by the police. The limited evidence provided by this study suggested that 9 per cent. of the recovered firearms were known to have been used in crime (although others may have been). Virtually all the guns were licensed. Details are provided in "The theft of firearms", Home Office Research and Planning Unit Paper No. 84, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the timetable for claims under each of the options under the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 to be (a) approved and (b) paid out; and what consideration will be given to claims submitted late; [22087]

(2) how many claims for compensation he received under the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 under claim options A, B and C in the month the legislation took effect and in each subsequent month until the deadline occurred; how many claims in each category were received late; how many claims for compensation under each of the options have been (a) approved and (b) paid out in each of the months since the Act took effect; and for each figure what percentage of the total this represents. [22086]

Mr. Michael: It has always been recognised that the pressure of claims received over the short hand-in period was bound to involve time in processing, and claimants were advised that they may have to wait several weeks before receiving any payment.

Most claims under Options A and B will have been dealt with before the end of March; regular payments on Option C claims will have begun by then. Some dealers who have claimed under Option C have already received at least one interim payment. Under the terms of the Scheme the deadline for the surrender of handguns to the appropriate police force was 30 September 1997, although claims continue to be received in the Home Office Firearms Compensation Section in respect of items surrendered by that date. These will be considered in the normal way. No claims can be accepted in respect of items surrendered after 30 September 1997.

As at 12 December 1997, 39,896 claims have been received and 23,183 payments made, as follows:

Month	Number of claims received	Number of payments made	Payments as a percentage of claims received
July	7,514	351	4.7
August	11,117	2,602	15.9
September	13,387	4,091	22.0
October	6,407	7,646	38.2
November	1,225	5,483	50.9
1–12 December	246	3,010	58.2
Total	39,836	23,183

With the exception of a few interim payments to dealers under Option C, all payments are under Options A and B of the Scheme. The totals include payments under the ex gratia scheme for the surrender of small calibre pistols. Payment is normally made immediately after a claim has been authorised.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to establish the whereabouts of asylum seekers in the United Kingdom whose addresses are not known to the authorities. [21844]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 19 December 1997]: The onus is on the individual applicant to maintain proper contact with the Home Office: a failure to do so could result in the application being refused for non-compliance with the procedures. If it appears that an individual is likely to abscond, consideration will be given to the use of detention. Those granted temporary admission to the United Kingdom will usually be subject to restrictions requiring them to reside at a fixed address and to report as necessary to a police station or immigration office. Where individuals do abscond, their details are circulated widely and immigration officers are tasked with tracing them.

Racially Motivated Crime

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many racially motivated crimes in the Greater London area have been reported during 1997; and if he will make a statement. [21888]

Mr. Michael: Racial incidents figures are submitted by each police force to Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary at the end of each financial year. The incidents are recorded under the Association of Chief Police Officers' definition of a racial incident:

"any incident in which it appears to the reporting or investigating officer that the complaint involves an element of racial motivation, or any incident which includes an allegation of racial motivation made by any person".

Precise figures for the Greater London area are not available because that area is not exactly coterminous with police force areas. However, the number of racial incidents recorded by the Metropolitan Police and the City of London Police during 1996–97 is 5,631. This is higher than the 1995–96 figure (5,013), which reflects a general increase in the number of racial incidents recorded by the police in England and Wales.

It is difficult to be precise about the extent to which rising figures may be partly due to increasing willingness among ethnic minority communities to report these incidents and an increasing confidence that the police service take these matters seriously. Police forces are also taking steps to increase the reporting rate of racial incidents to derive a better picture of the type of incidents taking place, and to discover when and where they are taking place and on whom. Such developments are also likely to be influencing both public confidence and the number of offences reported.

Citizenship Applications

Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ensure that persons whose applications for British citizenship are being refused are given the reasons for such decisions. [22439]

Mr. Straw: Yes. This Government believe in greater openness in public administration, as we showed last week when we published the White Paper on the Freedom of Information Bill. This openness is especially necessary where our decisions affect the rights of individuals. I have long been unhappy with the practice not to give reasons when refusing some applications for British citizenship, and relying upon section 44(2) of the British Nationality Act 1981 as the authority for not doing so. Since taking office in May, I have considered this matter in considerable detail. I am required to give reasons in a wide range of immigration cases and I can see no persuasive argument why my decisions involving the refusal of British citizenship should not similarly be open to public scrutiny. I have therefore decided as a matter of principle that henceforth reasons should be given in such cases.

One immediate consequence of this decision concerns the appeal to the House or Lords from the Court of Appeal in the cases of R v Secretary of State for the Home Department ex parte Mohamed Abdel Moneim Fayed and ex parte Ali Fayed regarding the application of section 44(2). I have today instructed the Treasury Solicitor that these appeals should be withdrawn. The effect of this is that the judgment of the Court of Appeal quashing the decisions made in 1995 to refuse these two applications now stands.

It will now fall to me to decide the applications on Mohamed and Ali Fayed, on their merits, and I cannot comment upon them further at this stage. I should also make clear that, in reaching the decision on principle that reasons should be given in citizenship cases, I have not considered any of the original papers in the Fayeds' application.

Justice and Home Affairs Council

Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Justice and Home Affairs Council held in Brussels on 4 and 5 December. [22440]

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend and I represented the United Kingdom at the Council, together with my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department. The main matters dealt with were as follows:

The Council agreed as "A" points, among other things, a resolution on marriages of convenience, the organisation of future work on revising the Brussels and Lugano Conventions on recognition and enforcement of judgments in matrimonial, civil and commercial matters, and a joint action on a mechanism for evaluation of the fight against organised crime. Several regulations relating to Europol were also agreed, dealing with its computer system, its budget for 1998 and its relationship with third countries and international organisations.

Political agreement was reached on a text of the "Brussels II" Convention on jurisdiction, recognition and enforcement of judgments in family matters. The Convention will enhance procedures for the recognition of marriages, divorces and adoptions within the European Union. The text will now be considered further, taking into account any views expressed by the European Parliament, with a view to signature of the Convention by June 1998.

The scope of the draft Convention on mutual legal assistance in criminal matters was discussed. This Convention covers the giving and receiving of assistance and evidence during criminal investigations and prosecutions. The Council agreed that the Convention would not contain provisions on cross-border investigation techniques, which could be the subject of a separate Protocol, along with provisions on search and seizure. Initial negotiations on the terms of the Protocol could begin under the United Kingdom Presidency, before the Convention itself was finalised.

Discussion on the draft convention on enforcement of driving disqualifications revealed that a number of member states had unresolved problems which required further work. Progress on the Action Plan on Organised Crime was noted. Two elements in particular were touched on: finalisation of the Naples II Convention on mutual assistance and co-operation between customs administrations, which is due to be signed before the end of the year, and ratification by all member states of the Europol Convention, which is on course for early 1998.

The Council took stock of the position reached on the draft joint action to establish a European judicial network, which seeks to improve the effectiveness and efficiency of current arrangements for requesting and granting mutual legal assistance through a network of contact points. It was agreed that member states would notify the Council informally of the contact points which they intended to nominate, pending a decision at the next meeting of the Justice and Home Affairs Council in March 1998.

Some progress was made on the draft joint action on making it a criminal offence to participate in a criminal organisation. A number of difficulties still remain, particularly concerning the definition of the conduct to be criminalised. The joint action was remitted to the Committee of Permanent Representatives for further work.

The Council agreed a draft joint action establishing a funding programme for training, visits and exchanges in the fight against organised crime (the FALCONE programme). The Council also approved a report on organised crime in the European Union in 1996, for submission to the European Council.

The Council took stock of the position reached on a draft resolution on a strategic action plan for customs co-operation in the Third Pillar. In the absence of agreement on the territorial application of the resolution, the Council instructed the Committee of Permanent Representatives to find a solution.

The Council approved a report on the internal and external threat from terrorism, for submission to the European Council; took note of a draft report to the European council on drugs; and approved a report for the European Council on implementation of the joint action of December 1996 on approximation of laws and practices to combat drugs.

The Council agreed in principle to amend the definition in the Europol Convention of "trafficking in human beings" so as to include trafficking in the child pornography. This was necessary to enable the Europol Drugs Unit to collect and analyse data on the subject. At the request of one member state, the K4 Committee was instructed to ensure that Europol's remit was extended to cover terrorism as soon as possible, and at latest within two years of Europol beginning its work.

The Council agreed that a further action plan should be drawn up making specific proposals for countering a recent increase in illegal immigration from Iraq. Justice and Interior Ministers would take stock of progress when they met informally in Birmingham at the end of January.

The Council discussed the draft EURODAC Convention for exchange and comparison of the fingerprints of asylum seekers. Agreement was reached in principle on some outstanding questions concerning the storage and erasure of data under the Convention. The working group will now begin drawing up the technical specifications for the system.

The Council also discussed a draft joint action establishing a programme for training, exchanges and co-operation in the fields of immigration, asylum and the crossing of external frontiers (the Odysseus programme). In the absence of agreement on the provisions concerning crossing of external frontiers, the Council remitted the issue to the Committee of Permanent Representatives for further consideration.

The Council held meetings, as part of the Structured Dialogue, with Ministers of the associated Central and Eastern European countries (CEEs) and, separately, with Cyprus. Discussion with the CEEs centred on mutual legal assistance, particularly in the areas of extradition, money laundering and the Lugano Convention on jurisdiction and enforcement of judgements in civil and commercial matters. The question of illegal immigration from Iraq was also raised, as well as asylum matters. In the meeting with Cyprus, Ministers from Cyprus set out the measures that it had taken to combat money laundering and described the position in Cyprus with regard to illegal immigration and Iraqi refugees.

At the Council, the Luxembourg Presidency hosted an informal joint lunch of Justice and Health Ministers to exchange views on drugs matters. The discussion highlighted the range of measures currently taken within member states to combat drugs abuse and the value to be obtained from the exchange of information and ideas.

Tobacco (Identity Cards)

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will issue guidelines to independent retailers of tobacco on establishing whether a customer is aged over 16 years; and if he will encourage the introduction of an ID card system for young people wishing to purchase tobacco. [22222]

Mr. Michael: Guidelines were issued to local authorities in 1992 on the application of the Children and Young Person (Protection from Tobacco) Act 1991 and we have no plans to change that guidance. It is for the retailer to ensure that the person to whom cigarettes are sold is not under the age of 16, but if they are in any doubt about their responsibilities they can contact their local Trading Standards Officer who has responsibility for enforcing the 1991 Act. The retailer will have a defence to any possible prosecution if he can show that he took all reasonable precautions and exercised all due diligence to avoid committing the offence. The Government are encouraging the use of voluntary "proof of age" cards produced by the Portman Group in respect of licensed premises and would be interested in any comparable proposals by the industry in the context of young people wishing to purchase tobacco.

Police Act 1997

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to have completed drafts of the regulations referred to in subsection 4 of section 115 of the Police Act 1997. [22365]

Mr. Michael: We are currently reviewing the provisions relating to criminal records checks in Part V of the Police Act 1997. Our top priority in doing so is the protection of children and other vulnerable people. We shall consider the possible introduction of regulations under this section during the course of the review.

Mr. Farrakhan

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on his review of his predecessor's decision to deny Mr. Farrakhan permission to visit the United Kingdom. [20304]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have asked for the views of a range of interested parties, as well as those of Mr. Farrakhan himself, before deciding whether to maintain the exclusion. Representations both in support of and against Mr. Farrakhan's continued exclusion have been received and need to be carefully considered before a decision is made. The final outcome is not expected to be known for several weeks.

Prisoner Statistics

Ms Roseanna Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the numbers of (a) male prisoners held, (b) male deaths in prison and (c) male suicides in prison in each of the last 10 years; and how many in each of the categories in each year were (i) on remand and (ii) convicted prisoners. [22117]

Ms. Quin: I will write to the hon. Member.

Crime (Witnesses and Victims)

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) who determines the level of accommodation and support afforced to victims of crime who are being offered official protection; and on what guidance he relies for that determination; [21939]

(2) how many witnesses to crime, receiving official protection, were housed in local authority accommodation in each of the past five years; and how many are currently in such accommodation; [21934]

(3) how much was spent on official protection of victims of crime in each of the past five financial years; and what is the budget for (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000; [21937]

(4) how much was spent on official protection of witnesses to crime in each of the past five financial years; and what is the budget for (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000; [21936]

(5) how many (a) witnesses to crimes and (b) victims of crimes were offered official protection in each of the past five years; [21938]

(6) who determines the level of accommodation and support afforded to witnesses to crime who are being offered official protection; and on what guidance they rely for that determination; [21940]

(7) how many victims of crime, receiving official protection, were housed in local authority accommodation in each of the past five years; and how many are currently in such accommodation. [21935]

Mr. Michael: Measures to help protect witnesses who are likely to suffer from intimidation are currently being considered by the inter-departmental review of vulnerable or intimidated witnesses which was announced by my right hon. Friend on 13 June 1997. I understand that the Association of Chief Police Officers is also looking at this issue with a view to developing national guidelines.

Until now, information on the protection of (a) witnesses to crime and (b) victims of crime has not been collected centrally. The allocation of resources, including the provision of accommodation, is a matter for chief officers of police and local housing authorities. There is no national scheme for the protection of witnesses in this country so whether to offer protection in any particular instance is a decision for the chief officer of the force concerned.

In the 1994 British Crime Survey (BCS), victims and witnesses of crime were asked whether they had suffered any harassment or intimidation as a result, and whether they had reported this to the police. Although we cannot tell how many people were offered assistance or protection as a result, the figures give a maximum estimate for the number of crime incidents in which victims may require protection. The 1994 BCS estimated that a minimum of 6 per cent. of all crime incidents in 1993 led to intimidation of the victim (about one million incidents). The victim reported this intimidation to the police in 23 per cent. of such incidents. Therefore, a rough estimate of the number of such incidents reported to the police in 1993 was 250,000. However, only a small proportion of intimidated witnesses and victims would be suitable and willing for high level protection schemes which are expensive and require major life changes such as moving home and severing connections with the past.

Of respondents to the 1994 BCS, 27 per cent. had witnessed at least one of four crimes (vandalism, burglary, car crime or assault) in the last five years. Intimidation of witnesses was rare. Of those who witnessed any of the four crimes, only 4 per cent. experienced intimidation. Witnesses reported intimidation to the police in 39 per cent. of cases. It is not possible to derive a number of incidents.

Police Drivers

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the amount of money spent on the training of police drivers in each police authority for each year since 1991. [21789]

Mr. Michael: The information requested is not held centrally in the form requested and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. I will write to the hon. Member as soon as possible with the information that is currently available and an explanation of the issues involved, and will place a copy of my reply in the Library.

Crime and Disorder Bill

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he plans to introduce provisions in the Crime and Disorder Bill for financial penalties on statutory agencies for failure to meet time limits in individual cases. [21931]

Mr. Michael: No. However, the courts will be able to enforce statutory time limits by making use of their existing power to impose 'wasted costs orders', which are applicable to both prosecution and defence. The Government's recent consultation paper "Tackling Delays in the Youth Justice System" set out the possible advantages and disadvantages of using financial penalties on statutory agencies to enforce time limits in individual cases and asked for views on this point. Over 85 per cent.

of those who expressed a view on the merits of such penalties opposed their introduction or expressed significant concerns. Respondents pointed out in particular that contested penalties might lead to further delays and damage the inter-agency co-operation which is critical to tackling delays. In the light of the response to the consultation paper, we have decided not to introduce any provision in the Crime and Disorder Bill for financial penalties on statutory agencies for failure to meet time limits in individual cases.

We are also looking very closely at other means of promoting efficiency within the youth justice system. In particular, as set out in the White Paper "No More Excuses" (Cmnd 3809) we will be introducing performance targets, which will operate in parallel with statutory time limits but will be more exacting. We will judge performance across the youth justice system in relation to these targets. The Youth Justice Board, which is to be established under the Crime and Disorder Bill, will also be able to publish information about performance across the youth justice system, and we believe that this will be an effective means of promoting accountability and give a strong incentive to better performance.

WPC Fletcher

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 24 November 1997, Official Report, column 441, what report he has received from Commander David Venness in relation to investigations into the murder of WPC Fletcher. [20161]

Mr. Straw: The police investigation into the murder of Woman Police Constable Fletcher is continuing. The police inquiries will be completed as soon as is practicable, and I expect to receive a report at that point.

Magistrates Courts Rules

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the provisions in the magistrates courts rules which may prevent or discourage magistrates from questioning defendants about the reasons for their behaviour before reaching a final decision on sentencing. [21930]

Mr. Michael: It is the Government's intention positively to encourage magistrates to question defendants about the reasons for their behaviour as part of our plans to make offenders accountable for their actions and to make them participants rather than passive observers in court proceedings which affect them. The White Paper "No More Excuses: A New Approach to Tackling Youth Crime in England and Wales" (Cmnd 3809) set out the Government's intention to remove any obstacles in the Magistrates' Courts Rules which may prevent or discourage magistrates from questioning defendants in the Youth Court about the reasons for their behaviour, before reaching a final decision on sentencing. Specifically, the Government intend to review the Rules to determine (a) whether there are any such obstacles on the face of the Rules; (b) whether in practice any of the Rules are regarded as inhibiting dialogue with the defendant; and (c) whether the existing Rules should be clarified or extended to encourage magistrates to question defendants about the reasons for their behaviour in order that this can inform decisions about sentencing. Until this review is completed, it is not possible to list the provisions of the Rules which may prevent or discourage magistrates from questioning defendants about the reasons for their behaviour before reaching a final decision on sentencing.

Police (Sickness)

Sir Brian Mawhinney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, by police force, the cost of sickness in each of the past five financial years and the cost to date in the current financial year. [21933]

Mr. Michael: This information is not available. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary, in its report on The Management of Sickness Absence and Medical Retirement in the Police Service, published on 16 December this year, estimates the total cost at £210 million a year, and recommends that police forces should in future cost sickness absence on the basis of a common formula.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 303

SESSION 1997–98

15th December—22nd December 1997

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instruments etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker's rulings and statements'.

Other contributions by Speaker and deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates and Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates, etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Comm = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
